1.2 Henry Fielding: An Introduction

---

Henry Fielding was born on April 22, 1707, in Somersetshire, England, to a well-connected and aristocratic family. His father, Edmund Fielding, was a colonel in the army, and his mother, Sarah Gould Fielding, belonged to a prominent family in Dorset. As a member of the landed gentry, Fielding was raised in an environment of privilege and received a well-rounded education, which would later influence his literary career.

Fielding’s early education took place at Eton College, where he studied classical literature and formed friendships that would last a lifetime. After completing his studies at Eton, Fielding went on to study law at the University of Leiden in the Netherlands, which further broadened his intellectual horizons. Upon his return to England, Fielding chose to pursue a career in literature and theatre rather than the legal profession.

In 1728, Fielding began his career as a playwright, producing several successful comedies and satires, such as “Love in Several Masques” and “The Temple Beau.” His plays were known for their wit, humour, and sharp social criticism, often targeting political corruption and the hypocrisy of the upper classes. However, Fielding’s satirical approach and unapologetic critiques of powerful figures eventually led to the passage of the Licensing Act in 1737. This legislation imposed strict censorship on theatrical productions, effectively ending Fielding’s career as a playwright.

After the Licensing Act, Fielding shifted his focus to writing novels and resumed his legal studies, eventually becoming a practicing barrister in 1740. Fielding’s first novel, “An Apology for the Life of Mrs. Shamela Andrews,” was published in 1741. It was a satirical response to Samuel Richardson’s popular novel “Pamela” and showcased Fielding’s talent for humour and social commentary.

Fielding’s most famous work, “The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling,” was published in 1749. The novel follows the life of the eponymous hero, Tom Jones, who is abandoned as a baby and raised by the kind-hearted Squire Allworthy. Tom’s journey from childhood to adulthood is filled with adventure, love, and personal growth, as he encounters various characters from different social classes and backgrounds. “Tom Jones” was an immediate success and remains a classic of English literature, celebrated for its complex characters, narrative innovation, and biting satire.

In addition to “Tom Jones,” Fielding authored several other novels, including “Joseph Andrews” (1742) and “Amelia” (1751). These works continued to showcase Fielding’s skill in crafting engaging stories that shed light on the social issues and moral dilemmas of 18th-century England.

During this period, Fielding also became increasingly involved in the legal profession and public service. In 1748, he was appointed Justice of the Peace for Westminster, and in 1749, he became Chief Magistrate of London. Fielding’s dedication to social justice and reform led him to establish the Bow Street Runners, considered the first professional police force in London. Fielding’s experiences in law enforcement provided him with a unique perspective on crime, poverty, and social inequality, themes that would continue to inform his literary works.

Despite his professional successes, Fielding’s personal life was marked by tragedy and loss. He married his first wife, Charlotte Cradock, in 1734, and they had five children together. However, only one of their children survived to adulthood, and Charlotte passed away in 1744. Fielding later married Mary Daniel, Charlotte’s former maid, with whom he had another five children.

As his health began to decline in the 1750s, Fielding sought relief in Portugal, where he hoped the warmer climate would improve his condition. Unfortunately, his health did not improve, and he passed away on October 8, 1754, in Lisbon. Fielding’s literary legacy endures through his groundbreaking novels, which established him as a pioneer of the English novel and a master of satire. His keen insights into human nature, social issues, and moral complexities have ensured that his works remain relevant and engaging, inspiring generations of readers and writers who appreciate his wit, humour, and unflinching commentary on 18th-century society.

1.3 Major Works of Henry Fielding

Henry Fielding, an influential English novelist and playwright, is best known for his satirical and humorous works that offer social commentary on 18th-century England. His major works include plays, novels, and essays. Here, we will discuss some of his most significant works:

“Joseph Andrews” (1742): Fielding’s first full-length novel, “Joseph Andrews,” was originally intended as a parody of Samuel Richardson’s “Pamela.” “Joseph Andrews,” a novel written by Henry Fielding and published in 1742, is a satirical and comic work that parodies the sentimental novel, particularly Samuel Richardson’s “Pamela.” Fielding’s novel is considered a significant early example of the English comic novel, reflecting the author’s belief in the importance of humour as a means of moral instruction.

The story follows Joseph Andrews, a handsome and virtuous young footman who is the brother of Pamela. Lady Booby, his employer, tries to seduce Joseph, but he remains steadfast in his virtue, resisting her advances. When Lady Booby dismisses Joseph from her service due to his refusal, he begins a journey back to his hometown, hoping to reunite with his beloved Fanny Goodwill.

During his travels, Joseph encounters various characters who exemplify the hypocrisy, vice, and moral failings of 18th-century English society. Fielding employs a picaresque structure, with the story unfolding through a series of loosely connected episodic adventures. The novel's satirical tone is directed at social, political, and literary conventions, including the artificiality of sentimental fiction.

One of the central characters in the novel is Parson Adams, a kind-hearted, yet naive clergyman who accompanies Joseph on his journey. Adams serves as a foil to Joseph, and their interactions reveal the contrast between genuine goodness and moral pretension. The novel ultimately champions the importance of compassion, sincerity, and moral integrity over social status and wealth.

"Joseph Andrews" is notable for its wit, humour, and sharp social commentary. Through engaging characters and amusing situations, Fielding critiques the moral corruption of society and exposes the flaws of human nature. The novel's innovative blend of satire, character development, and episodic storytelling has made it an enduring and influential work in the history of English literature.

"Tom Jones" (1749): Fielding's most famous novel, "The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling," tells the story of an abandoned child raised by the benevolent Squire Allworthy. As Tom Jones embarks on a series of adventures, the novel explores themes such as human nature, morality, social class, and love. Celebrated for its vivid characters, engaging plot, and innovative narrative technique, "Tom Jones" remains a classic of English literature.

"Amelia" (1751): Fielding's final novel, "Amelia," centres on the life of a virtuous woman and her husband, Captain William Booth, who faces various challenges, including poverty and imprisonment. "Amelia," a novel written by Henry Fielding and published in 1751, is a sentimental and moralistic work that explores themes of love, marriage, and social injustice in 18th-century England. Regarded as Fielding's last and darkest novel, "Amelia" diverges from the comic and satirical tone of his earlier works like "Tom Jones" and "Joseph Andrews."

The novel follows the story of the virtuous and loving Amelia Booth and her husband, Captain William Booth. The couple faces numerous challenges, including poverty, deceit, and moral temptation, as they navigate the complex and often corrupt social milieu of London. Fielding uses the characters' trials and tribulations to highlight the flaws of society, including the legal system, the military, and the treatment of women.

"Amelia" is a critique of the hypocritical moral values of the time, as Fielding delves into the darker aspects of human nature, including jealousy, betrayal, and cruelty. The novel also examines the struggle between personal morality and societal expectations, as the characters grapple with the consequences of their actions.

Fielding's portrayal of Amelia as a strong, virtuous, and loving woman is a notable departure from the passive and submissive female characters typically found in sentimental novels of the period. In this sense, "Amelia" can be seen as a precursor to later feminist literary works.

Despite its somber themes, "Amelia" maintains Fielding's trademark wit and humor, providing readers with a compelling exploration of human frailty and the importance of moral fortitude. The novel's richly drawn characters and poignant depiction of societal ills have contributed to its lasting influence in the development of the English novel.

“An Apology for the Life of Mrs. Shamela Andrews” (1741): This short satirical work is a parody of Richardson’s “Pamela,” mocking the sentimentality and moralizing tone of the original novel. In Fielding’s version, Shamela is a manipulative and deceitful character who pretends to be virtuous in order to secure a wealthy husband.

Plays: Prior to his career as a novelist, Fielding was an accomplished playwright. Some of his notable plays include “Love in Several Masques” (1728), “The Temple Beau” (1730), “The Author’s Farce” (1730), and “The Modern Husband” (1732). Fielding’s plays often targeted political corruption, social hypocrisy, and the excesses of the upper classes. The wit and satire present in his plays would later be evident in his novels.

These major works highlight Fielding’s contributions to the development of the English novel and his mastery of satire and humor as tools for critiquing 18th-century society. His innovative narrative techniques, memorable characters, and keen insights into human nature have cemented his reputation as a significant figure in English literature.

1.10 Picaresque Novels

The picaresque novel is a genre of prose fiction that originated in Spain during the early 16th century. The term "picaresque" is derived from the Spanish word "pícaro," which means "rogue" or "rascal." This genre is characterized by the adventures and misadventures of a resourceful, cunning, and often morally ambiguous protagonist.

Picaresque novels typically follow the life and experiences of a low-born but clever hero who relies on their wits to survive and advance in a corrupt society. The protagonist, or pícaro, typically navigates through various social classes and settings, exposing the vices and hypocrisies of society along the way.

The picaresque novel emerged in response to the social and economic changes that were taking place in Spain during the Renaissance. The genre reflects the growing dissatisfaction with the existing social order and a growing interest in realism in literature. The first picaresque novel is often considered to be "Lazarillo de Tormes," published anonymously in 1554. It set the stage for other picaresque works that followed, both in Spain and across Europe.

Elements of Picaresque Novels:

Episodic structure: Picaresque novels are often composed of loosely connected episodes or adventures that the protagonist experiences as they move from one situation to another.

First-person narrative: These novels are usually narrated in the first person by the protagonist, providing a direct and personal account of their life and experiences.

Satire and social critique: Picaresque novels often contain elements of satire and expose the flaws and hypocrisies of various social classes and institutions.

Realism: The genre is marked by its focus on the gritty details of everyday life, often incorporating realistic dialogue and descriptions of various social settings.

The pícaro: The protagonist is often a marginalized figure who uses their cunning and adaptability to navigate through society and overcome the challenges they face.

Examples:

"Lazarillo de Tormes" (1554) - This anonymous Spanish work is considered the first picaresque novel and follows the adventures of the young Lazarillo as he serves different masters and learns to survive in a corrupt society.

"Guzmán de Alfarache" (1599) by Mateo Alemán - This novel follows the life of Guzmán, a swindler who eventually repents for his actions and becomes a moral example.

Book I

Book I opens with the author's introduction and explanation of his intention to present a realistic portrayal of human nature in the novel. The story begins at the home of Squire Allworthy, a wealthy and benevolent landowner, who discovers a baby boy in his bed after returning from a trip to London. Allworthy, who is childless, decides to raise the child as his own and names him Tom Jones. He enlists his housekeeper, Mrs. Deborah Wilkins, to help care for the child.

Allworthy's sister, Bridget, comes to live with him, and the two siblings discuss Tom's possible parentage. Bridget later marries Captain Blifil, a cunning and hypocritical man, and they have a son named Master Blifil. The two boys, Tom and Blifil, grow up together under Allworthy's care, and their contrasting personalities become evident. Tom is good-hearted and full of life, while Blifil is mean-spirited and self-serving.

Analysis:

Book I of "Tom Jones" serves to introduce the major characters and themes of the novel. The story begins with a focus on Squire Allworthy, who embodies the virtues of benevolence and compassion, and his decision to raise Tom Jones as his own son highlights the themes of generosity and human goodness.

The novel's comedic elements are evident in Fielding's satirical portrayal of society and its hypocrisies. Fielding uses humor and irony to expose the flaws and shortcomings of various characters, such as the vain and self-righteous Mrs. Deborah Wilkins or the manipulative and deceitful Captain Blifil.

Additionally, Book I sets the stage for the conflict between Tom Jones and Master Blifil, which will be a central theme throughout the novel. Their contrasting personalities emphasize the novel's exploration of human nature, as Tom represents the inherent goodness in people despite his flaws and mistakes, while Blifil embodies the darker, more selfish aspects of humanity.

In conclusion, Book I of "Tom Jones" establishes the main characters, themes, and conflicts that will be developed throughout the novel. Fielding's use of humor, satire, and realism in his portrayal of human nature sets the stage for a compelling exploration of morality, social norms, and the complexities of the human experience.

Book II

Book II of “Tom Jones” continues the development of the characters and themes introduced in Book I. As Tom and Blifil grow older, their contrasting personalities become even more apparent. Tom is portrayed as a good-hearted, generous, and warm young man, whereas Blifil is cunning, hypocritical, and self-serving.

Squire Allworthy’s health takes a turn for the worse, and the entire household believes that he is on his deathbed. Blifil and Thwackum, the boys’ tutor, manipulate the situation for their own advantage. Blifil feigns concern for Allworthy, while secretly rejoicing at the prospect of inheriting his wealth. Thwackum, a hypocritical and self-righteous clergyman, attempts to gain Allworthy’s favour in order to secure a better position for himself.

When Tom hears the news of Allworthy’s imminent demise, he is genuinely heartbroken and prays for his recovery. Allworthy unexpectedly recovers, and the household returns to normal. Tom’s heartfelt reaction to Allworthy’s illness earns him the squire’s favour, while Blifil’s deceitful behaviour begins to be seen in a negative light.

Meanwhile, Captain Blifil dies, leaving Bridget a widow. Soon after, the arrival of Dr. Harrison, a virtuous and wise clergyman, leads to the dismissal of Thwackum as the boys’ tutor. Dr. Harrison becomes an important figure in their lives, providing guidance and support for Tom.

Through their relationship, Fielding explores the complexities of love, trust, and forgiveness, as well as the transformative power of genuine affection. Sophia’s unwavering love for Tom is a driving force in his personal growth and redemption, and their eventual union serves as a testament to the enduring nature of true love.

Sophia’s relationship with her father, Squire Western, is another important aspect of her character development. Squire Western, a boorish and domineering figure, attempts to control Sophia’s life and force her into an unwanted marriage with Blifil. In response, Sophia demonstrates courage, resilience, and resourcefulness by standing up to her father and ultimately escaping his control.

Female Agency and Independence: Sophia Western is an embodiment of female agency and independence in a society that often limits women’s autonomy and choices. Her refusal to conform to societal expectations and her determination to marry for love rather than wealth or status exemplify her strength of character and her belief in the importance of personal happiness.

Sophia’s independence is further demonstrated by her decision to leave her father’s home and venture out on her own in search of Tom. Despite the risks and challenges she faces, Sophia’s resourcefulness, courage, and determination allow her to navigate a male-dominated world and to assert her own desires and agency.

Virtue and Morality: Sophia serves as a moral compass in the novel, representing the values of virtue, integrity, and genuine goodness. Her unwavering commitment to her principles sets her apart from other characters who are more willing to compromise their values for personal gain or social advancement.

Sophia’s moral integrity and kindness are evident in her interactions with other characters, such as her genuine concern for Tom’s welfare and her willingness to forgive him for his past mistakes. Her moral compass also plays a crucial role in her romantic relationship with Tom, as her love for him is based on mutual respect and shared values, rather than superficial attraction or social ambition.

Role in the Novel: Sophia Western plays a central role in “Tom Jones,” both as a love interest for the protagonist and as a symbol of virtue, independence, and moral integrity. Her character serves to highlight the importance of personal growth, self-discovery, and the transformative power of love.

2.8.3 Blifil

In “Tom Jones,” Henry Fielding presents Blifil as the primary antagonist, a foil to Tom, and a representation of hypocrisy, deceit, and selfishness. As a complex character with a significant impact on the narrative, Blifil’s motivations, relationships, and role in the story warrant close examination.

Background and Personality: Blifil is the son of Squire Allworthy’s sister, Bridget, and Captain Blifil. Raised alongside Tom by Squire Allworthy, Blifil receives the same education and opportunities as his half-brother. However, Blifil’s character is marked by his cunning, deceitfulness, and self-serving nature. He is skilled at manipulating others and concealing his true intentions, often presenting himself as a paragon of virtue and morality while pursuing his selfish ambitions.

Blifil’s hypocrisy and selfishness are evident in his interactions with other characters and his efforts to undermine Tom. He frequently feigns concern for Tom’s welfare while secretly plotting against him and working to tarnish his reputation. Blifil is driven by jealousy, greed, and a desire for power, which ultimately lead him to betray those who trust him and to seek the downfall of his half-brother.

Relationships and Manipulation: Blifil’s relationships with other characters in “Tom Jones” are characterized by his manipulative and deceitful nature. He uses his outward appearance of virtue and morality to gain the trust of others, including Squire Allworthy, while secretly pursuing his own self-interest.

One of Blifil’s primary motivations is his desire to secure his position as Squire Allworthy’s heir, which leads him to undermine Tom at every opportunity. He constantly schemes against Tom, spreading lies and false accusations to discredit him in the eyes of their guardian. Blifil’s cunning and manipulative tactics not only damage Tom’s reputation but also serve to further ingratiate himself with Squire Allworthy.

Blifil’s relationship with Sophia Western is another example of his duplicity and selfishness. He is more interested in securing her wealth and status than in genuine affection, and he manipulates both her and her father to try to force her into marriage. Blifil's lack of genuine love or respect for Sophia stands in stark contrast to Tom's sincere and devoted affection for her.

Role as Antagonist: Blifil serves as the primary antagonist in "Tom Jones," representing the darker aspects of human nature and providing a foil for Tom's more genuine and earnest character. Through Blifil's actions and motivations, Fielding explores themes of hypocrisy, deceit, and the destructive power of selfish ambition.

Blifil's antagonism toward Tom serves to heighten the stakes of the narrative and provides a source of conflict and tension throughout the story. His schemes and machinations create numerous obstacles for Tom to overcome, driving the plot forward and contributing to Tom's personal growth and redemption.

Downfall and Redemption: Blifil's cunning and deceitful nature ultimately lead to his downfall. As the novel progresses, his treachery and hypocrisy are gradually exposed, and he loses the trust and support of those around him. Despite his efforts to undermine Tom and secure his own position, Blifil is ultimately undone by his own greed and ambition.

In the novel's conclusion, Blifil is given a chance at redemption when Squire Allworthy forgives him and provides him with the means to start a new life. This act of mercy and compassion highlights the novel's themes of forgiveness and the potential for change, even in characters who have exhibited great moral failings.

Social Critique and Satire: Blifil's character serves as a vehicle for Fielding's critique of 18th-century English society.

In conclusion, Blifil's character in "Tom Jones" represents hypocrisy, deceit, and selfish ambition, providing a stark contrast to Tom's genuine and earnest nature. As the primary antagonist, Blifil drives much of the conflict and tension in the novel, revealing the darker aspects of human nature. His eventual downfall serves as a cautionary tale about the consequences of greed and duplicity. However, his chance for redemption, granted by Squire Allworthy, emphasizes the novel's themes of forgiveness and the potential for personal growth and transformation, even for those who have demonstrated significant moral failings.

A picaresque novel is a genre of prose fiction that follows the adventures of a roguish, low-born protagonist as they journey through a series of episodes, often satirizing social norms and institutions. Fielding's "Tom Jones" can be considered a picaresque novel due to the following elements:

Rogue protagonist: Tom Jones, the protagonist, is an attractive, resourceful, and kind-hearted young man, but he is also flawed and prone to errors in judgment. Although he is not inherently malicious, his impulsiveness and naivety often lead him into trouble, making him a roguish hero typical of the picaresque genre.

Episodic structure: The narrative of "Tom Jones" is marked by a series of loosely connected episodes, each presenting a new adventure or challenge for Tom. As he journeys from his rural home to London, he encounters various characters and situations that provide insight into 18th-century English society. This episodic structure is a hallmark of the picaresque novel.

Satire and social critique: Fielding uses the adventures of Tom Jones as a means to satirize and critique various aspects of society, such as social class, gender roles, and moral hypocrisy. Through Tom's encounters with people from all walks of life, Fielding exposes the vices and follies of human nature and the shortcomings of societal institutions.

Realism: Picaresque novels often strive for a sense of realism, presenting a detailed and authentic portrait of the society and culture they depict. In "Tom Jones," Fielding's vivid descriptions of the English countryside and London, as well as his portrayal of characters from diverse social backgrounds, contribute to the novel's realistic and immersive atmosphere.

Moral ambiguity: While picaresque novels often contain moral messages or lessons, they tend to explore the complexities of human nature rather than presenting a clear-cut moral framework. In "Tom Jones," Fielding examines the concepts of virtue and morality, acknowledging that human beings are inherently flawed and capable of both good and bad actions. This moral ambiguity is consistent with the picaresque tradition.

Humor and wit: Picaresque novels are known for their humor and wit, often employing irony, satire, and wordplay to entertain the reader and emphasize the absurdities of human nature. This self-awareness and exploration of the nature of fiction adds a layer of complexity to the narrative.

Omniscient narrator: Fielding employs an omniscient third-person narrator in "Tom Jones," allowing him to delve into the thoughts, feelings, and motivations of various characters. This narrative choice provides a comprehensive view of the characters' inner lives and enables Fielding to present a more nuanced exploration of human nature.

Linear and retrospective storytelling: While the main narrative of "Tom Jones" unfolds linearly, Fielding often uses flashbacks and retrospection to provide background information or context for the characters and their actions. This technique adds depth to the story and helps to build a more complete understanding of the characters and their motivations.

Fielding’s portrayal of hypocritical characters serves as a critique of the superficial morality prevalent in society.

Gender roles and expectations: Fielding critiques the rigid gender roles and expectations placed on women during the 18th century. Female characters such as Sophia Western and Lady Bellaston face societal pressures to conform to certain standards of behaviour and propriety, often at the expense of their own desires and well-being. Henry Fielding's "Tom Jones," published in 1749, is a classic comic novel that explores a variety of themes relevant to 18th-century society. The novel is both an engaging story of the titular character's romantic and moral adventures and a satirical commentary on social, political, and literary issues of the time. Here, we will discuss the major themes present in the novel.

Fielding examines the differences between genuine goodness and moral pretension through the contrast of his characters’ behaviours. Tom Jones, despite his many flaws and indiscretions, embodies true goodness and humanity, while other characters, such as Blifil, may appear morally upright but are in fact hypocritical and self-serving. The novel argues that true virtue lies in sincerity and compassion, rather than adherence to social conventions and appearances.

The Importance of Love and Marriage: “Tom Jones” is, at its core, a love story, and it delves into the themes of love, passion, and marriage. Throughout the novel, Fielding portrays the power of love to inspire, redeem, and transform individuals. Tom’s love for Sophia Western serves as a driving force behind his personal growth and moral development. The novel also critiques the societal constraints on love and marriage, as relationships are often dictated by financial considerations and social status rather than genuine affection and compatibility.

Social Class and Hypocrisy: Fielding uses “Tom Jones” to critique the rigid social hierarchy of 18th-century England, highlighting the hypocrisy and corruption that often underlie the distinctions between the classes. The novel presents characters from various social backgrounds and shows that nobility of character is not determined by birth or social standing. By exposing the flaws and inconsistencies of society, Fielding encourages readers to question the validity of social conventions and prejudices.

The Journey Motif and Self-Discovery: The picaresque structure of “Tom Jones” involves a journey motif, as Tom embarks on a series of adventures and misadventures that ultimately lead to self-discovery and personal growth. ### 3.2 JANE AUSTEN: LIFE

Jane Austen (1775-1817) was born on 16 Dec. 1775 in the Hampshire village of Steventon, where her father, the Reverend George Austen, was a clergyman. Her family was long and she was the second daughter and seventh child in a family. The seventh child of a rural clergyman was respected for his learning and literary taste. Two of her brothers followed their father to Oxford and into the Church, and two others rose to be admirals in the Navy. Except for brief schooling in Oxford, Southampton, and Reading, which ended at the age of nine, Austen was educated at home. She learned French, a smattering of Italian, some history, and, in addition to Shakespeare and Milton, gained a thorough acquaintance with the essayists, novelists, and poets of the eighteenth century.

Always somewhat shy but lively and witty, Jane Austen developed into a young lady of cultivated manners and pleasing appearance, who at balls and assemblies enjoyed her share of masculine attention. A brief but genuine romance with a young man whose identity is uncertain ended suddenly with his death. When she was nearly twenty-seven, she accepted, and the next day rejected, the proposal of Harris Bigg Wither, a friend whom she realized she did not love.

Aside from writing, Jane Austen devoted her life to domestic duties and household affections, and especially to being the companion and confidante of numerous nieces and nephews. Having spent the first twenty-five years of her life in the rectory at Steventon, she was removed in 1801, upon her father's retirement, with her parents and sister Cassandra to Bath. After her father died in 1805 and a sojourn of three years in Southampton, she settled with her mother and sister in a cottage belonging to her brother Edward at Chawton, Hampshire, where she resided until two months before her death. Here, working mainly in the general sitting room, she composed the final drafts of all her major works, hurriedly slipping the small sheets under the blotting paper if a visitor or servant appeared. In 1816 her health began to fail; and in May 1817, she and Cassandra moved to Winchester for adequate medical attention. Despite weakness and pain, she remained cheerful to the end. Dying peacefully on July 18, 1817, aged forty-one, she was buried in Winchester Cathedral.

3.3 JANE AUSTEN'S LITERARY WORKS

Jane Austen (1775-1817) was an English novelist known primarily for her six major novels. Her first novel was published when she was thirty-five. Her first completed novel was 'First Impression' known as 'Pride and Prejudice'. Her first published novel is Sense and Sensibility (1811). After the publication of this novel, she published other five novels one by one: Pride and Prejudice (1813), Mansfield Park (1814), and Emma (1816). She died in 1817 and her remaining two novels were published posthumously in 1818 entitled Northanger Abbey and Persuasion. She also left behind three volumes of juvenile writings in manuscript, a short Epistolary Novel Lady Susan, and another unfinished novel, The Watsons. Her six full-length novels have rarely been out of print, although they were published anonymously and brought her moderate success and little fame during her lifetime.

(A) SENSE AND SENSIBILITY

It was Austen's first published novel in 1811. The novel was reasonably well-liked and successful. The story deals with two sisters Elinor and Marianne. In this novel, Elinor is represented as a character with great "sense" (although Marianne, too, is described as having sense), and Marianne as a girl having a great deal of "sensitivity". The novel has been dealt with a philosophical depth through the sketch of these two characters.

The novel tells the story of the impoverished Dashwood sisters. In the opening scene, Marianne becomes infatuated with the attractive John Willoughby, who seems to be a romantic lover, but he is a fortune hunter. Her stepbrother Mr. John Dashwood inherited her father's estates and rejected her stepmother and sisters. They settled in Barton where Elinor and Marianne fell in love with Colonel Brandon and Edward Ferrars respectively. In the last scene, Edward marries Elinor and Colonel Brandon marries Marianne. Mrs. Dashwood, the mother of Elinor became delighted at the good fortune of her children.

(B) PRIDE AND PREJUDICE

The novel, Pride and Prejudice was published in 1813 and set in rural England in the early 19th century. The novel is a story of the Bennet family: Mr. Bennet and Mrs. Bennet include their five different daughters named Jane, Elizabeth, Catherine, Lydia, and Mary. Mrs. Bennet is anxious to see all her daughters married. To fulfil her desire Mrs. Bennet works hard mentally and physically. One day she hears news of some young boys' arrival in her neighbor's locality and she selects two young wealthy boys. She elects Darcy for Elizabeth and Mr. Bingley for Jane. At a ball, the wealthy and newly arrived Charles Bingley takes an immediate interest in the eldest Bennet's daughter Jane. The encounter between his friend Darcy and Elizabeth is less cordial. Although some misunderstanding intrigued by each other the couple (Darcy and Elizabeth) received each other heartily. The novel ends with the happy marriages of Jane and Mr. Bingley, and Elizabeth and Mr. Darcy. Mrs. Bennet is perhaps the happiest of all: she feels accomplished for having married off three of her daughters.

(C) MANSFIELD PARK (1914)

Mansfield Park thematically centers on the issue of morality in three different layers of society: the aristocratic Bertrams, the fashionable, city-dwelling Crawfords, and the down-and-out Prices. Although the protagonist, Fanny Price, is merely a poor, shy relation, more than willing to be marginalized by the effusive Bertrams and the sophisticated Crawfords, she surpasses them all through her innate sense of morality and familial duty. Although she loves Edmund Bertram, she keeps her feelings to herself because she realizes he loves Mary Crawford. She refuses to manipulate him into thinking otherwise, even though she realizes Mary is manipulative and disingenuous. Furthermore, although she has the opportunity to marry Henry Crawford, she forgoes the chance to be rich and socially elevated in hopes that she will find true love. In the end, Fanny emerges triumphant because she sees those around her for what they truly are. By remaining true to her values, she wins Edmund's love, as well as the respect and adoration of everyone at Mansfield Park. This novel, which is considered the author's most ambitious novel, was published anonymously in 1814. In its tone and discussion of religion and religious duty, Mansfield Park is the most serious of Austen's novels. The heroine, Fanny Price is a self-effacing and unregarded cousin cared for by the Bertram family in their country house. Fanny emerges as a true heroine whose moral strength eventually wins her complete acceptance in the Bertram family and marriage to Edmund Bertram himself, after that family's disastrous involvement with the meretricious and wayward-living Crawfords. In a short while, as might be expected, Henry leaves the disgraced Maria, who is forced to live with her aunt, Mrs. Norris. Julia and Yates are in time accepted by the family, and Edmund comes to look upon Fanny with the eyes of love. After marrying, they move to the parsonage, Susan replaces Fanny at Mansfield Park, and all live happily.

EMMA

The novel, Emma was first published by John Murray in December 1815. It was the last of Austen's novels to be published before her death, and, like her earlier works, was published anonymously. Of all Austen's novels, Emma is the most consistently comic in tone. It centers on Emma Woodhouse, a wealthy, pretty, self-satisfied young woman who indulges herself with meddlesome and unsuccessful attempts at matchmaking among her friends and neighbours. After a series of humiliating errors, a chastened Emma finds her destiny in marriage to the mature and protective George Knightly a neighbouring squire who had been her mentor and friend.

E) PERSUASION

This is Jane Austen's last completed novel. She began work on it in the summer of 1815 and completed it by the summer of 1816. The work was published with Northanger Abbey posthumously in December of 1817, six months after Austen's death. Persuasion tells the story of a second chance, the reawakening of love between Anne Elliot and Captain Frederick Wentworth, whom seven years earlier she had been persuaded not to marry. Now Wentworth's from the Napoleonic Wars with prize money and the social acceptability of naval rank. He is an eligible suitor acceptable to Anne's snobbish father and his circle, and Anne discovers the return continuing strength of her love for him. Austen was keenly aware of the human quality of persuasion: 'to persuade or to be persuaded, rightly or wrongly.

(E) NORTHANGER ABBEY

Northanger Abbey was published posthumously in 1818. The novel is largely set in the resort town of Bath, which Austen visited for a month-long vacation in 1797. Northanger Abbey combines a satire on conventional novels of polite society with one on Gothic tales of terror. Catherine Morland, the heroine of the novel, is an innocent abroad who gains worldly wisdom. Her lover and guide are the self-assured and gently ironic Henry Tilney, her husband-to-be. She begins to weave a fanciful story around the Tilney family. Though deeply attached to Eleanor and Henry, she has been puzzled by the General, whose politeness toward her has not always extended to his children. Catherine detects some mystery about the fate of his wife, who died when Eleanor was a child. Catherine feels humiliated but Henry helps her to regain her self-respect. News from Bath that Isabella has rejected James for Frederick Tilney reminds them of the world outside. The Tilneys' certainty that the General will disapprove of Isabella leads Catherine to wonder if he will approve of her, but on a visit to the parsonage which is to be Henry's future home, the General hints that Catherine is well-fitted to be its mistress. A letter from Isabella confirms that Frederick's attachment has been short-lived. Catherine resolves that such a fickle woman cannot be her friend. Catherine is told that General Tilney leaves the young people to visit London but suddenly is to leave Northanger Abbey immediately. Henry declares his love for Catherine and decides to marry her. With the help and compromise of Eleanor, Henry and Catherine get married and the novel ends.

3.4 Jane Austen as a Novelist

Jane Austen's novels were first published when she was thirty-five years old. Her first completed novel, First Impressions (the lost original of Pride and Prejudice), began in October 1796 and finished in August 1797, her father offered it to a publisher without success. In November 1797, she started Sense and Sensibility and Northanger Abbey, a revised version of which entitled Susan. She sold it in 1803 for ten pounds to the publisher Crosby, who advertised but failed to publish it; finally retrieved it in 1816, and an amended text appeared posthumously in 1818. The Watsons (1871, 1927), a fragmentary progenitor of Emma, and Lady Susan (1871, 1925), a biting epistolary satire, probably the germ of Mansfield Park, have survived in manuscripts written on paper watermarked 1803 and 1805 respectively. She authored six unique literary novels. These novels are Sense and Sensibility (1811), Pride and Prejudice (1813), Mansfield Park (1814), Emma (1815) Northanger Abbey (1817), and Persuasion (1818). There are some chief characteristics of Jane Austen as a novelist given below:

3.4.1 Her perfection of Art

Jane Austen occupies a prominent place in the history of the art of fiction. Though she was a contemporary of Sir Walter Scott, she is more in line with her predecessors in this art than with him. She widened the scope of fiction in almost all its directions. No writer, it may be presumed, is so conscious of her limitations as Jane Austen but never does she feel the temptation of essaying beyond her range. The result is nothing short of perfection. This is evident by such epithets as "two inches of ivory" or "Ivory towered" employed by the critics to indicate the perfection attained by her in her small world of the country bourgeoisie.

3.4.2. Plot-construction

She writes about material events and interests with a singular freedom from uncertainty. She possesses one rich talent of the artist in abundance: her cocksureness over her material, and her novels have, in consequence, an exactness of structure and a symmetry of form which are found more often in French literature. There is usually a tangle of emotions of which her plots are made. The essentials of her art are often the same: a well-defined story growing naturally out of the influence of character and developed amid a society that is full of mild provincial humors. She manages all this so perfectly that no praise of her art of plot construction can ever be over much. These plots are dramatically as perfect as the five-act comedies of the Restoration period. Like the situations in the Comedy of Manners, the situations in her novels also are ironic as well as psychological. Placed in a particular situation, the character almost unconsciously starts revealing the inconsistencies of his behavior which are immediately exposed to the ridicule of the readers. Juxtaposed with her dramatic plots is the dramatic quality of her dialogues.

3.4.3 Her Art of characterization:

As for her art of characterization, her suggestion through them of a wider perspective of life is not covered by the story. She learned much from her predecessors but more from her practice. She borrows the realism of Defoe, the psychological grasp of Richardson, and the comic aptitude of Fielding. Her characters grow out of her plot just as her plot is the result of the psychological conflict and involvement of her characters. Her characters are, therefore, complex and round. She holds the psychology of her "dramatic personae". She is born of her habit of minute observation as well as her intuitive understanding of the traits of a character. Her significant contribution to the art of characterization in fiction lies in her suggestions and her perspective.

3.4.4. Her realism

Jane Austen therefore combined the Domestic and the novel of manners and brought them to perfection. Richardson had explored the minds and hearts of his characters while Fielding had parodied the heated atmosphere of Richardsonian fiction. By a sheer stroke of artistry, she combines the good points of Richardson and Fielding and sketches events, characters, and dialogues that are psychologically true and perfect. She possesses in a remarkable degree all those qualities that are needed to impart realism to her world: her sense of the comic, affinities with and conscious apprenticeship of the eighteenth-century masters, fairness and detachment, limited world where the comic spirit stalks with a rod in her hand correcting the follies of the people and her anti-romantic and anti-sentimental attitude coupled with those merits of style which any great writer of the eighteenth century in England and France would be jealous of cultivating are here displayed to their best advantage.

3.4.5. Her Use True of Satire.

The most debatable point is the unique type of satire that she presents in her novels. Some people think that her satire is genial and light; as such it is only discover a ruthless and even cruel touch in her comic treatment. Satire, another form of irony; whereas others is springs forth moral and ethical bias which is consistently absent in Jane Austen. She never concerns herself with religious or moral issues of the day.

Even an elopement is devoid of any breach of the ethical code. But the fact cannot be ignored that Jane Austen is too preoccupied with good breeding and fine culture. Whatever jeopardizes good sense is revolting to her and elicits from her a quick response. For Jane Austen, a slight breach of common-sense is no less in magnitude than an ethical rupture or moral turpitude. Because of this preoccupation, her treatment of the comic becomes satirical. But this fact does not expunge either the possibilities or the existence of pure humour also. Some of her scenes are not laughter-provoking but they leave a rippling sense of humour. She touches the humorous side of almost every scene.

3.4.6 Her Sense of Impartiality.

She can capture the comic effect largely due to her sense of detachment. Comedy springs from intellect, a tragedy from our heart. The finer comic effect as distinct from the humorous will be achieved if we withdraw our sympathies from the object who is the victim of comedy. Jane Austen also never allows her sympathies to intrude especially when a character has some Comic Flaw (if such a term can be used as opposed to the 'tragic flaw') in him. Although she seems to project her point of view through and to take the side of, her leading female characters even these are not spared by her. Her objectivity, fairness, and detachment help her a good deal in achieving the comic effect. The structure of her novels and the people who move in this world contribute no less to this effect. The situations in her novels are themselves ironic and these invariably display the comic side of her characters. These characters are more or less funny in proportion to their command of common sense. Women on the whole have more claims to it than men as Meredith also discovered later on. But it is not all women who possess it and only a few can be said to have perfect command over it. In Jane Austen, women are always superior to their husbands in wit and good sense.

3.4.7. Poetic Justice

As for poetic justice, it may be well to remember that Jane Austen had no poetic pretensions. In her world therefore there is all justice and nothing poetic. This poetic justice as such has not been forced upon the structure but if there is justice in her world, and of course it cannot be denied that the eighteenth-century society that she transcribed was not without respect for values and ideals, it grows naturally out of the resolve of the tangled issues. The rewards are not thrown in her world from above by some impartial benevolent observing deity, as we find it thrown on Mr. Micawber, for example in Dickens, who has all along his life been hoping for something to happen and at the end finds himself a magistrate in a new country. As such in the world of Jane Austen, there are neither thoroughly good nor thoroughly vicious individuals.

3.4.8 Her Style and Technique

Her prose is an aggregate of all those qualities which were highly prized by the classical age—the qualities of precision, exactness, and truth. The temper of the twentieth century which seeks a conscious revival of these classical graces has been unsparing in the praise of the prose-style of Jane Austen. Considerably because of her style, she is considered to be the fine flower of the Eighteenth Century. She describes the minute shades and psychological involvements primarily because of a forceful style and fulfils the idea of "what off was thought but ne'er so well expressed. In short, it is not insignificant to know that some of her works as her Juvenilia and others that were not published during her lifetime and which remained sullied in some obscure corners have been published only in our century. The existing century has discovered

3.5 LET US SUM UP

Jane Austen's novels form a distinct group in which a strong element of literary satire accompanies the comic depiction of character and society. Austen's plots often explore the dependence of women on marriage in the pursuit of favourable social standing and economic security. Her works critique the Sentimental Novel of the second half of the 18th century and are part of the transition to 19th-century literary realism. Her uses of biting irony, along with her realism, humour, and social commentary, have long earned her acclaim among critics, scholars, and popular audiences alike. Despite her short time behind the writing desk, Jane Austen remains one of the most well-known and admired writers in literary history.

4.2 Her Novel: Emma (1815)

A general summary: 'Emma' has two interconnecting plots: The outward plot and inward plot. The 'outward plot' is concerned with the comings and goings, advances and reverses of a small circle of moderately well-born people in a provincial town, Highbury. The 'inward' plot is concerned with the mind of the novel's heroine, Emma Woodhouse. The outward plot tells the love stories of three couples, whose weddings are the culmination of the novel. These couples are Emma and Mr. Knightley, Frank Churchill and Jane Fairfax, Harriet Smith and Robert Martin. The inward plot traces the development of Emma's mind from ill-founded self-satisfaction through several humiliations, to self-knowledge and good sense. The two plots are very closely linked, partly because almost all the action takes place around Emma, but principally because much of it is initiated by her. Her manipulation of the characters around her affects their stories, and also demonstrates her state of mind: her 'fancy', or imaginary perception of what a situation is or might be, leads her and them into many false positions.

The characters whom we first meet around Emma are her indulgent but demanding father; her former governess Mrs. Weston and her new husband and Mr. George Knightley, a neighboring landowner. We later meet her sister Isabella and her husband John, who is Mr. Knightley's brother and other neighbours, including Mrs. and Miss Bates. Emma determines to find a wife for Mr. Elton, the vicar. When she meets Harriet Smith who is pretty but not very intelligent and socially inferior to herself, she decides to befriend her. Despite Mr. Knightley's warnings, Emma brings them together a great deal at her house. Harriet refuses the proposal of marriage whom she does not think grand enough for her. Mr. Knightley who thinks the two ideally matched in rank and education, angrily criticizes Emma for interfering, and tells her that Mr. Elton will never marry Harriet, who has neither wealth nor rank. They quarrel.

Her suspicions about Mr. Dixon are increased when an unknown admirer sends Jane Fairfax a piano. Mrs. Weston, however, suspects that the sender is Mr. Knightley and he might marry Miss Fairfax. Frank Churchill criticizes Jane Fairfax to Emma, who tells him her suspicions about Mr. Dixon. The next day she feels that she has done wrong in gossiping to him. Frank Churchill, who often visits the Bateses, not only encourages Emma in her suspicions but hints about them to Miss Fairfax. He suggests that a ball be held in Highbury, and plans are made, but it is postponed when he has to leave because Mrs. Churchill is ill. Before he goes Emma thinks he is on the point of proposing marriage to her: she avoids what she thinks is to be the declaration, and reflects afterwards that he is very much in love with her, but that she is not much in love with him. She now conceives that he should marry Harriet. Mr. Elton returns with his bride, who is treated with all attendant upon a newly married woman. Mr. Knightley, on Emma's enquiry, makes it clear that he does not intend to marry Jane Fairfax, but he points She is extremely vulgar, out that Emma should have become her friend. She is high handed, snobbish and likes to manage the lives of others but yet she appeals to the reader. For all her failings, she has many good traits too. She is a dutiful daughter and a good friend and lacks vanity as to her personal beauty. Besides, she has the redeeming feature of being able to admit her faults once she recognizes them and is eager to make amends. With all her faults, Emma is full of vitality and warmth, something which Fanny Price in all her goodness lacks. Important to note here is that Emma is likeable because though she commits follies there are no serious moral vices in her.

Emma' is a contrast to 'Mansfield Park' just as 'Mansfield Park' is a contrast to 'Pride and Prejudice' It is an ironical comedy and the heroine is as different as possible from Fanny Price. The atmosphere is pleasant and comfortable with much wit, irony and light laughter and with none of the self-justification or morality which is so evident in 'Mansfield Park.' The comic irony arises from having a heroine who is deluded. The work takes on something of the interest of the detective story - The reader is given the same clues as the heroine as to what is going on and his enjoyment increases as he sees that his own suspicions, and not Emma's fancy, were right.

4.3 Important Characters of Emma

EMMA WOODHOUSE

Introduction: Jane Austen in her precise compact and straight forward style plunges the reader directly into the novel and in the very first page we have a character-sketch-a summing up of Emma - the heroine who is also the focal point of the novel. The education of Emma as it were, from conceit and delusion to self-knowledge and awareness, is in fact the theme and substance of the novel and hence a study of her character is particularly important.

Background: Through direct narration Jane Austen introduces us to the heroine "Emma Woodhouse, handsome clever and rich, with comfortable home and happy disposition seemed to unite some of the best blessings of existence and had lived nearly twenty-one years in the world with very little to distress or vex her." By the fourth paragraph we have been told of the real evils of her situation. She is the second daughter of a very affectionate and indulgent father, and has been the sole mistress of the house since she is twelve years old as her mother had died and her elder sister Isabella was married and settled in London. Now having lost Miss Taylor - her governess and friend to matrimony, she is lonely and without the right companionship. Surrounded as she is by an overindulgent father, a governess who had been unable to impose any restraint and devoid of friends who are her social and intellectual equals, Emma has "the power of having rather too much her own way, and a disposition to think a little too well of herself."

Her physical beauty: Emma is described as "the complete picture of grown-up health" with regular features, open countenance and a firm and upright figure by Mrs. Weston in her talk with Knightley in chapter five. Her prettiness is emphasized by Knightley, Frank Churchill and other characters too. And to the credit of Emma, she is not vain about her beauty. Jane Austen had said that she had taken is not the perfect heroine. At the very beginning we are warned a heroine whom no one but she could like. This is because Emma of her power of having things her own way and her disposition "to think a little too well of herself." Her errors are many, most of which arise from her conceit, her self-confidence and her refusal to heed wiser counsels. This brings grief to her as well as to the others she has tried to manage.

Emma's self-deception: Emma is both victim and perpetrator. Being an heiress and daughter of the principal of her errors and inhabitant of a small county town, she is accustomed to being looked up to and deferred to on all occasions. Her self-confidence and trust in her own understanding of humanity lead her into harbouring many illusions. In the very first chapter, we see Emma harbouring the illusion that she has brought about the matrimonial alliance between Miss. She patronizes Harriet Smith and without any real basis imagines her to be the daughter of a gentleman and encourages her to fall in love with Elton after refusing Robert Martin's proposal. Having decided to make a match between Harriet and Elton, she deludes herself about Elton's every action. Mr. Elton's attention to herself, his praise of the portrait Emma has sketched are all taken by Emma as evidence of his admiration for Harriet Smith. She ignores Knightley's view of Elton as a man who knew his own good. Emma is under the illusion that she is always in the can wantonly interfere in the lives of others imagining that she is promoting their happiness. She thinks matchmaking "is the greatest amusement in the world" and without considering Harriet's preferences decides to match her with Elton. Her matchmaking extends to herself too and she thinks of a match between Frank and herself. When she realizes that she does not love him, she readily shifts Frank to Harriet, without a thought for Frank's own preferences. Emma is guided by her whim and fancy in judging people rather than by their true natures. This is borne out throughout the novel. Emma lets her imagination run away with her and though she thinks she is in the right; she is in fact always embarrassingly wrong. Without any real evidence Emma imagines a relationship between Jane Fairfax and Dixon. She does not judge Frank Churchill well. Even when Knightley warns her of a possible attachment between Jane and Frank, she dismisses it. So convinced is she of her own judgement that she even commits the indiscretion of confiding in Frank her conjectures about Jane and Dixon. This lands her in a horrifyingly embarrassing situation, when the secret engagement between Jane and Frank Churchill is revealed.

Emma a poor judge of character: Her lack of judgement is revealed in her reading of Elton's character. She thinks him to be a well-mannered gentleman who would be the right match for Harriet. Once again it is Knightley who is more accurate in judging Elton. He tells Emma, "Depend upon it, Elton will not do. Elton is a very good sort of man, and a very respectable vicar of Highbury, but not at all likely to make an imprudent match. He knows the value of a good income as well as anybody. Elton may talk sentimentally, but he will act rationally."

Emma's snobbery: Her snobbery is evident in her attitude to Mr. Robert Martin. She thinks him socially beneath Harriet and therefore compels Harriet to refuse his proposal. Convers(e)ly she is offended by what she thinks is Elton's presumpt(u)ousness in aspiring for her (Emma's) hand in marriage. Emma's steps towards full awareness: Her of which she had repressing resolutions formed immediately after the Elton-Harriet debacle is soon forgotten and Emma continues in her interference and highhanded ways imagining relationships where none exist (Jane and Dixon, Frank and herself, Frank and Harriet) Not until the end of the morning at Box Hill, does Emma really begin her journey towards self-awareness. Emma is overwhelmed by her realization of her intellectual and social pride when Knightley rebukes her for her unthoughtful rudeness to Miss. Bates: "Never had she felt so agitated, mortified, grieved at any circumstance in her life. She was most forcibly struck. How could she have been so brutal so cruel to Miss. Bates! How could she have exposed herself to such ill-opinion in anyone she valued!" Emma cries all the way home and these tears mark her true repentance and the beginning of Emma's self-awareness. It is clear then that Emma has not immediately the next morning. She is genuinely anguished and mortified at her own behaviour and takes pains to correct it immediately. In the same way she tries to make amends for her neglect of Jane Fairfax by inviting her to Hartfield and by offering Arrowroot. Nor does she bear ill-will when Jane Fairfax refuses the offer and realizes that her former coolness deserves the present rebuff. She has however, yet to undergo the trials and pain of unrequited love. The revelation of Frank's secret engagement to Jane (the climax of the plot) makes her realize that contrary to her imagination that she was in control, she had all along been duped and manipulated by Frank Churchill. This humiliation is however nothing compared to the revelation Harriet makes. Harriet is not in love with Frank as Emma had imagined but with Mr. Knightley. This explodes her last misconception and she realizes that "Mr. Knightley must marry no one but herself." (Chapter 47). Finally, Emma is in a situation which Knightley had wished for, "Emma in love, and in some doubt of a return." This pain completes the education of Emma as she is now completely aware of the misery, she has brought on herself and others by manipulating them to suit her own whims and fancy, finally after much soul-searching and self-reproach, Emma finds happiness when Goerge Knightley proposes to her. In her new found happiness and love she is ready to forgive Frank Churchill and goes more than halfway to effect reconciliation with Jane Fairfax. Harriet too finds her happiness with Robert Martin, away from the interference of Emma and Emma also admits her error in misjudging Martin.

Conclusion: As we have seen, Emma's character changes for the better. Jane Austen traces her development from a rich, snobbish, highhanded girl to a mature, humble and reflective young woman. Just as Mr. Knightley finally declares Emma as being faultless in spite of her faults, we are also won over by her genuine feelings of guilt and grief at her wrong-doings in spite of her stubbornness, her wil(l)ful imagination and blindness to reality and her unjustified confidence. The whole subject matter of Emma' revolves round the heroine's painful discovery of the truth about herself and the way in which she is gradually stripped free of illusions.

JANE Fairfax

Introduction: Jane Fairfax is a kind of a foil to Emma and her character is to be studied bearing in mind the comparison and contrasts with Emma herself. Jane Austen is handicapped in her characterization of Jane Fairfax, by the necessity of maintaining the secret engagement as part of the intrigue in her plot structure. It is for this reason that Jane seems to be a rather colourless individual, compared with other women in the story. She appears cold and distant not only to Emma but to the reader too. This is because she does not take much direct part in the story and exists more as a character about whom other people talk and think. Jane Austen has here presented Jane Fairfax through the eyes of others, through a variety of points of view.

Background: Much before she is actually introduced towards the end of the first volume, we hear of her from Miss. Bates. Jane is the niece of Miss. Bates and her letters are constant topics of conversation for Miss. Bates. This explains part of Emma's dislike when she tells Harriet that "I wish Jane Fairfax very well, but she tires me to death" And we are told about Jane's impending visit to Highbury, the Campbell's holiday at Ireland, Emma's conjecture about Dixon and Jane before we are finally introduced to her in chapter twenty with the usual character sketch. Jane is an orphan at three, her father Lieutenant Fairfax having died in action abroad and her mother succumbing to consumption and grief soon afterwards. Brought up initially by her grandmother and aunt (Mrs. and Miss. Bates) she would have been confined to this narrow upbringing had it not been for Colonel Campbell a friend of her father's. The Campbells had taken Jane under their wing and had provided her with the best of education developing her talent and her mind. Jane, thus has grown up to be an attractive and cultured young girl.

Emma is struck by her remarkable elegance and Jane pretty and accomplished: Jane is described as elegant in beauty. Emma feels that "her face-her features there was more beauty in them all together than she had remembered; it was not regular, but it was very pleasing" (Chapter 20) But more than her elegance of look and manner are her accomplishments. She is very talented, especially in playing the piano and even Emma, who is otherwise not favourably disposed to her, praises her fine skill at the piano. Apart from Emma, almost everyone has a good opinion about Jane Fairfax. Isabella thinks of her as "sweet, amiable" and a delightful companion for Emma Knightley too praises Jane's power of forbearance, patience, self-control and thinks she would be ideally suited as a companion to Emma. He feels too that Jane's sense and maturity would improve Frank Churchill, while the good Westons too have a good opinion of her.

Jane Fairfax's faults: Her major faults are her reserved nature and secretiveness. Emma cannot forgive Jane Fairfax her reserved and cold attitude. Emma feels: "She (Jane) was so cold, so cautious. There was no getting at her real opinion. Wrapt in a cloak of politeness she seemed determined to hazard nothing. She was disgustingly, was suspiciously reserved." Emma's enquiries about Frank Churchill or Dixon elicit very little information from Jane and she is evasive about her reason for collecting her letters personally from the post-office. Knightley too admits to a want of "open temper" in Jane, even though he has a high opinion about her attainments and disposition. Of course, her secretiveness is to be seen in the light of her engagement with Frank and then one cannot judge her too harshly. It weighs so heavily on her mind that it makes her uncommunicative and unhappy. When she refuses Emma's persistent attempts at friendship after the Box-Hill picnic, Jane seems capable of jealousy and resentment.

Jane might have been pliable enough to have been persuaded into a secret engagement but is resolute enough to break it off when she considers that Frank's behaviour merits such a step, and takes up the post of a governess, in spite of the difficulty and distress it causes her. While Emma imagines Jane's life with her aunt to be trying in the extreme, Jane herself does not betray any remark which might be construed as criticism of Miss Bates. On the contrary she appears to be a dutiful and affectionate niece. There are many points of similarity contrast between Jane Fairfax and Emma and this affects our view of her. While Emma appears warm, lively and healthy, Jane is cold, pale and sickly inspite of her beauty. Emma is rich, has her own establishment and need not work while Jane is poor, has no great future prospects except to become a governess and will have to live. Jane is accomplished and talented. is superior to Emma in playing the piano and in singing and it highlights Emma's own lack of application and inability to put in any serious practice. In fact, George Knightley thinks that Emma's dislike for Jane stems from her unconscious jealousy of Jane for Jane is the accomplished girl. Many readers find the relationship between Jane Fairfax and Frank Churchill unconvincing for if Jane is really the person, the author describes her to be, she could not have fallen in love with so frivolous a man as Frank Churchill or having fallen in love she could not have entered into a secret engagement with him. In this perhaps, we are unjust to Jane Fairfax. Given her circumstances, (she is an unprovided woman with no prospects other than becoming a governess and spending her holidays with Miss Bates) it is perfectly feasible that she consents to marry Frank Churchill. The alternative is so dull and horrifying that even though Jane Fairfax is as good as she is clever, and as clever as she is beautiful, she cannot but choose Frank Churchill.

Conclusion: Jane Fairfax the talented, cultured and elegant girl appears cold and reserved and as a mere show dowy figure, but this as we have seen is due to the exigencies of the plot. Jane Austen could not give an insight into Jane Fairfax's mind, for that would have shifted the focus of the novel away from Emma. This fault in characterization is why Jane seems a colourless individual. Secondly the secret engagement accounts for much of her frigidity and once that is revealed, we see a Jane Fairfax who is more relaxed and friendly. "Emma had never seen her look so well, so lovely, so engaging. There was consciousness, animation and warmth; there was everything which her countenance or manner could have ever wanted." She is aware that she had been cold and artificial as she had always a part to act and is apologetic to Emma about it and is warm and friendly with her after the engagement is in the open. We must admire with Frank Churchill that resolution of character which has carried her through her time of strain and we must agree that in marrying Jane, Frank is happier than he deserves to be.

HARRIET SMITH

Introduction: Jane Austen uses Harriet Smith as It is through Emma's patronage of Harriet that we learn of Emma's highhandedness, her self-deception, her snobbery and her love for matchmaking. Harriet Smith is in every way a contrast to Emma and finally it is through Harriet that Emma realizes her own love for Knightley and is educated. Thus, Harriet Smith has an important role to play in the novel, especially in the first volume where the Harriet-Elton debacle takes a prominent place. Jane Austen introduces Harriet Smith in Chapter 3 through the direct means of a character sketch.

Background: Harriet Smith was the natural daughter of somebody, that is, she is an illegitimate child who is a boarder at Mrs. Goddard's school. She is a very pretty girl, "short, plump and fair, with a fine bloom, blue eyes, light hair, regular features, and a look of great sweetness." Emma is impressed not merely by her beauty but by her docile nature and deference and decides to act as a guardian to her.

Harriet not clever: Harriet is like Jane from poor social position but unlike Jane Fairfax, Harriet has no remarkable talents or cleverness and in fact is quite ignorant. Knightley feels therefore that she will be a poor companion to Emma who will only be flattered by such ignorance and Emma on the other hand will merely puff up Harriet so that she becomes conceited and a misfit among people of her own social circle. Her lack of cleverness and judgement are quite evident. She is unable to figure out the charade that Elton sends and is quite confused though Emma deciphers it within minutes. She cannot discern the vast superiority of Jane Fairfax in playing the piano in comparison to Emma's own playing. She finds Martin's sensible letter of proposal too short and requires Emma's help in drafting a letter of refusal. All this reveal her lack of education and her ignorance.

Harriet's docile nature: Not only is Harriet ignorant, she is also docile and submissive. She is grateful to Emma for her patronage and submits without any protests to Emma's interference in her life. In spite of her liking for Robert Martin, she allows herself to be by Emma to refuse his proposal on the grounds that much to independently take a decision regarding Robert Martin and he is socially her inferior. She values Emma's friendship far too is influenced by Emma to even break off all relations with the Martin family. It does cause some distress to Harriet but she is too much in awe of Emma to protest. It is because she is so biddable that Emma likes her. Emma wants to mould Harriet to suit her own whims and fancies and to this end she encourages poor Harriet to fall in love with Elton. Harriet seems very fickle-minded in the ease with which she shifts her love from Robert Martin to Elton and then to Mr. Knightley and finally back again to Mr. Robert Martin. One may take a charitable view that she had retained her liking for Mr. Robert Martin and once outside the interfering influence of Emma, she accepts Martin's proposal. Harriet has a tender heart and disposition. She does not blame Emma for having encouraged her to fall in love with Elton. Nor does she blame Mr. Elton as she feels she never could have deserved him. Sentimentally she has preserved some mementoes of him, a pencil stub and a used plaster. Knightley too praises Harriet for having simple, honest and generous feelings. learn more about Harriet

Knightley's assessment of Harriet: We through Knightley's opinions. In the beginning he classifies Harriet as a girl with no claims of birth, nature or education and an unsuitable companion to Emma. He feels that Harriet must consider it her good fortune to be married to Robert Martin. But he later recognizes the good qualities of Harriet and is chivalrous in asking her to dance after Mr. Elton snubs her at the Crown Inn Ball. He sees her as a better person than Mrs. Elton and tells Emma: "Harriet Smith has some first rate qualities which Mrs. Elton is totally without. An unpretending, single minded artless girl - infinitely to be preferred by any man of sense and taste to such a woman as Mrs. Elton. I found Harriet more conversable than I expected" Later he praises Harriet for being without art or affectation and finds her particularly suited for a domestic life. Harriet's feelings for the humiliating snub of Mr. Elton, Harriet is grateful to dance with her and save her public humiliation. Emma's own encouragement to Harriet regarding marriage to a social superior, lead Harriet into believing that she is in love with Mr. Knightley and that Knightley too returns this love. Harriet, we see has thus come a long way. From the girl who thought that Elton was too appears good for her, she now aspires for Knightley himself. If she presumptuous or conceited in aspiring for Knightley, we have only Emma to blame. As Knightley had pointed out, Emma's interference and patronage of Harriet has only led her to conceit and a false sense of her own worth. But away from the domineering influence of Emma, Harriet finally finds her happiness with the sensible and hardworking Robert Martin.

Conclusion: Harriet Smith is a pretty, docile and sweet tempered girl who lacks intelligence and firmness of mind. She allows herself to be influenced by Emma but much must be excused considering her circumstances as an illegitimate daughter and her none too bright prospects. Jane Austen uses her as a foil to reveal Emma's character particularly her domineering ways. Emma's self-deception, her snobbery, her inability to judge people and situations correctly, her wilful imagination are all manifest in her manipulation of Harriet and in her attempts to make a match between Elton and Harriet. Harriet is particularly important in the education and self-awareness of Emma. It is only when Harriet expresses her love for Knightley that Emma realizes her own love for him and this marks the important beginning of her self-awareness. Thus Harriet Smith has an role to play in the novel.

4.4 Emma: A Domestic Comedy

Domestic Comedy:

Jane Austen presents a satirical portrayal of social life comic way. She does not merely satirize but create moral framework to operates all kind of domestic and social relationship in her works. It may be more apt to call her novels as a domestic comedy since Jane Austen's comic spirit is clearly manifested in the personal relationships of ordinary life. In Emma too many instances of comedy arise in the personal interaction between Emma, her father and her brother-in-law. Emma's own self delusion the ironic contrast between what she imagines and what really is provides much comic interest.

"Follies and nonsense, whims and inconsistencies" this is what Jane Austen satirizes in her heroine Emma as also in the characters of Miss Bates, Mr. Woodhouse and the Elton. The humor in the novel is to be found both in the situation and in the characters and proceeds chiefly from the use of irony." The comic interest arising from Emma's self-delusion: The whole of 'Emma' is conceived of as an irony arising out of what Emma imagines and what really is. This provides much of the comic interest in the novel. We are amused at Emma's assertion of her abilities as a matchmaker and her attempts at bringing about a marriage between Harriet and Mr. Elton. The ironic humor in this entire episode lies in the contrast between what Emma thinks she will achieve and what she does actually achieve. Emma goes to ridiculous lengths to provide opportunities for Mr. Elton and Harriet to meet and spend some time together even breaking her boot lace and falling back to tie it so that Elton would propose. But no proposal is forthcoming and in spite of Emma attributing the charade to Harriet, what follows is the comic and amusing reversal of events leading to Elton's proposal to Emma herself. The courtship and the "ready wit" were indeed meant for Emma and not for Harriet as she had imagined. Emma continues to commit blunders deluding herself about Frank Churchill and Jane Fairfax, suspecting an attachment between Jane and Dixon, and even making a match between Frank Churchill and Harriet, only to learn later of the secret engagement between Jane and Frank and Harriet's and her own love for Mr. Knightley. Her supreme self-confidence and her delusion that she is in the right is extremely comical in the light of the events which follow proving her wrong in each one of her conjectures. Jane Austen with gentle irony mocks her heroine's whims, and fancies and her follies presenting it in a comic light.

Comedy through characterization: Jane Austen's portrayal of Miss Bates and Mr. Woodhouse is gently satiric and provides much humour. Miss Bates with her excessive garrulity is endearingly absurd. With one breath she can talk of topics varying from the suitability of Augusta Hawkins to her own mother's liking for pork. She flits from topic to topic leaving sentences incomplete and committing various faux-apex by revealing what ought not to be revealed. For all her excessive talk which may appear tiresome and boring, Miss Bates is still likeable for her innate goodness and kind heartedness to one and all. Jane Austen portrays Miss Bates with sympathy thus making us laugh at her silliness and excessive garrulity but at the same time retaining our liking for her. Mr. Woodhouse is the other comic character and we are amused by his excessive concern about his own as well as other's health. Everyone is agreeable to him as long as the ladies dry their stockings after a rain and the young men do not insist upon opening the windows. Himself restricted to having thin smooth gruel, he is shocked that people are ready to have the cake at the Westons' egg prepared wedding. In all his talk about the wholesomeness just the right way by his cook Searle and his excessive concern about keeping out the draught of cold air and his insistence upon the merits of his physician Mr. Perry he appears absurdly comic. But Jane Austen not only presents him as a humorous character but also satirizes nothing him and hints at his selfishness which allows him to see beyond his own comfort and which makes him a good host only to those who comply with his wishes. The conversation between Mr. Woodhouse and his taciturn and curt son-in-law, John Knightley on the rival merits of their respective physicians is richly comic as also his eventually agreeing to the match between Emma and Knightley the poultry from thieves. It is in the character of Mrs. Elton that Jane satiric. Mrs. Elton with her vain, self-important talk is comic no doubt but she is also satirized most severely by Jane Austen and has no redeeming quality. Her airs, her constant name-dropping, her belief that the Suckling's with their barouche-landau are the best kind of gentry and that Maple Grove is the best estate and Surrey is the garden of England are all laughable. Her talk with Mr. Weston is richly comical. Both are characters of limited outlook and fixed ideas and their conversation with, Mr. Weston totally concerned with his son Frank Churchill and Mrs. Elton with Maple Grove offers excellent moments of comedy. Both are caught up with their own pet subjects and it makes it impossible for them to listen to, let alone understand each other. Mrs. Elton's monologue when, in all her 'apparatus' of happiness she picks strawberries at Donnell Abbey is also humorous. Comedy through wit: Jane Austen's major characters are often witty and it is from their perceptions and conversation that much humour arises. Emma has a quick mind and is not averse to making fun of other characters by mimicking them. For instance, she says of Mr. Elton, "He is an excellent young man, and will suit Harriet exactly, it will be an "Exactly so" as he says himself..." Similarly, her parody of Miss Bates' talk in case Knightley was married to Jane is extremely comic. She gives a perfect imitation of Miss Bates flitting from topic-to-topic thanking Mr. Knightley for his kindness in marrying Jane and in the same breath referring to her mother's old petticoat which was still very strong.

Conclusion: Jane Austen's vision of life is comic. Not for her the great tragedies of human suffering, she laughs gently at the follies and inconsistencies of human beings. Her method is that of irony but the moral it carries does not show any desire on her part to reform them. It only accepts and shows the ridiculous and the absurd and it is from our recognition of these very human follies that the smile of acknowledgement of humour and comedy arise.

4.5 Emma: Theme and Plot Construction

Jane Austen's ideas are able to identify several themes including prejudice, love power, marriage, wealth, reputation, class, self-knowledge. Emma deals the theme of love, marriage and class. Through these three basic theme of human relationship the novel runs. It has been said that the novels of Jane Austen have only one plot. Somerset Maugham holds the view that "she wrote very much the same sort of a story in her books" a marriageable maiden in a village. An eligible bachelor arrives. They fall in love; their relations develop and they are ultimately wedded". Jane Austen is unsurpassed in plot construction. Emma is a brilliant example of structural exactness and symmetry, with every character and situation. It can be said Emma has an 'outer' and an 'Inner' plot. The outer plot deals with what actually happens. From this point of view, it may be argued that Emma is about marriage. It begins with one (the Weston's) ends with three more and considers several other marital possibilities along the way. The inner plot is 'What Emma thinks is happening' and traces her development to self-knowledge and awareness from willfulness and vanity. The structure of the plot in Emma can be classified into two types: the external plot and internal plot. Emma is always the focus for us both statures. In outer plot, we may say coincides with the novel concerned with Emma's attempt to intervene in Harriet Smith's life and ends with the Harriet Smith. Jane Austen plunges the reader into the heart of her world and we are told that Emma Woodhouse is young, rich intelligent and beautiful and that "The real evils indeed of Emma's situation were the power of having rather too much her own way, and disposition to think a little too well of herself.' The supreme self confidence and serene delusion are evident in the Harriet Smith Mr. Elton debacle.

Harriet's herself. Emma's first error is her assumption that she can bring about a match between Harriet and Mrs. Elton. Harriet Smith is a young girl of unknown parentage and no social position. But, with lofty disregard of logic, Emma assumes that prospects in life are brighter because of this connection with Emma guided by whim and fancy rather than judgement automatically assumes that Elton's excessive interest in the portrait -sketch of Harriet as a tribute to Harriet rather than flattery of herself. Accordingly, when Harriet receives an offer of marriage from Robert Martin, Emma persuades her to reject the proposal as she considers Martin socially beneath her brilliantly prepared for scene in which Elton offends Emma by proposing to her and is himself angered by her disclosure that she considers the outcome of this blunder is a Harriet a suitable match for him. Harriet Smith is a young girl of unknown parentage and no social position. The inward plot traces the development of Emma's mind from ill founded self-satisfaction, through several humiliations, to self-knowledge and good sense. The two plots are closely linked because almost all the action takes place around Emma and what is more important is that much of it is initiated by her. Her manipulation of the characters around her and her imaginary perception of what is or might be leads her into committing many errors. With a plot where the heroine is led into errors and is constantly exposing her high-handedness, Jane Austen has the difficult task of making it appealing to the reader. She manages it with considerable skill and subtlety by presenting the story through Emma's eyes rather than through the outside. Fairfax's, Robert Martin's or Miss Bates' eyes Emma cannot but appear vain, snobbish, high-handed, lacking in tenderness and good will. It is therefore absolutely essential to use Emma's mind as a reflection of events.

The inside view: We are constantly given an inside view of Emma's thoughts. Jane Austen never lets us forget that Emma is not what she might appear to be. She may have her faults but she is quick to admit them and this is evident through the insight into her self-reproaches and reflections, after every misdeed. For every section devoted to her misdeeds there is a section devoted to her self-reproach. This structure based on the revelation of some truth followed by a period of anguished reflection on her part is one of the memorable features of the novel. It is assumed that "Mystery is essential to a plot and cannot be appreciated without intelligence" - This is what E.M. Forster has to say in 'Aspects of the Novel' and Jane Austen has so skilfully used this technique in Emma that it has often been called a 'detective novel'

4.6 Let us sum up

Jane Austen's novels form a distinct group in which a strong element of literary satire accompanies the comic depiction of character and society. Austen's plots often explore the dependence of women on marriage in the pursuit of favourable social standing and economic security. Her works critique the Sentimental Novel of the second half of the 18th century and are part of the transition to 19th-century literary realism. Her uses of biting irony, along with her realism, humour, and social commentary, have long earned her acclaim among critics, scholars, and popular audiences alike. Despite her short time behind the writing desk, Jane Austen remains one of the most well-known and admired writers in literary history.

5.2 Charles Dickens: Biographical Sketch

5.2.1 Life

Born on February 7, 1812, in Portsmouth, Hampshire, England, Charles Dickens was the most influential novelist of the Victorian era. Charles Dickens' full name was Charles John Huffam Dickens. His father, John Dickens, was a clerk in the Navy Pay Office and his mother, Elizabeth. He left Portsmouth in infancy and moved to London because of his father's transfer. Then two years later, he moved to Chatham. Here he spent five years (1817-1821) and enjoyed these days of his childhood. This is the place which Dickens has used in many of his novels. Later, he relocated to Camden Town, London, until 1860. Then he permanently moved to Gad's Hill.

Dickens's father had struggled with money and hence he took lots of debt. Therefore, he and his family were deeply affected by his father's debts, and they were sent to debt prison except for Charles. As the family's eldest son, he started working in a factory as his father went to prison for debt. He has gained sympathetic knowledge of this profession and presented it in his writings. The little earning of this little boy helped his family. He used to visit his father on Sundays. His father had saved away a little pension to improve his life. An elderly family member had left some money, which at least released them from prison. After being released, his father quickly took him out of the factory and placed him in school; again, his schooling got interrupted at age 15, and he joined as a clerk in a Solicitor's office. Later, he became a shorthand reporter in the law courts and, finally, a newspaper reporter. He enjoyed this profession.

One of the frustrating events that significantly impacted Dickens' life was his rejection by Maria Beadnell because Charles Dickens and his family's way of living did not attract her much. However, this rejection made a positive impact on his life. However, he loved her very passionately. Later on, this rejection helped indirectly in gaining success. The character of Dora Spenlow in David Copperfield (1849) and Flora Flinching in Little Dorrit (1855) reflects some resemblance to Maria Beadnell. Later, he got attracted to Catherine Hogarth, and they married in 1836. They had ten children: Charles, Mary, Kate, Walter, Francis, Alfred, Sydney, Henry, Dora, and Edward. This relationship also got break, and the couple got separated in 1858. Finally, Dickens was involved in a relationship with Ellen Ternan, who was an actress. This relationship lasted long rest of his life.

He died from a stroke on June fifty-eight on 9, 1870, at Gad's Hill, near Chatham Kent, and was buried in the Poet's Corner, Westminster Abbey. The inscription on his tomb reads: "He was a sympathizer to the poor, the suffering, and by his death, one of England's greatest writers is lost to the world".

5.2.2 Literary Career of Charles Dickens

Dickens started his career as a writer of "sketches" (these sketches were short pieces of everyday life and everyday people in the form of stories and essays) for the Monthly Magazine and the Morning

Chronicle under the pseudonym “Boz”. Later on, it attracted the reader’s attention and hence these sketches, collectively reprinted with the title Sketches Illustrative of Everyday Life and Everyday People, in February 1836. The same year, Dickens received a contract to write his first novel. It was a series of 20 monthly instalments, and the title of this series was The Pickwick Papers. It was a massive success for Dickens. Very soon, Dickens achieved worldwide recognition and became an international celebrity. His works were humorous and satirical; however, he keenly observed character and society.

His literary success continued with Oliver Twist, published in serial form between 1837-1839 and in book form in 1838. It is the story of Oliver Twist, a young orphan boy. Nicholas Nickleby (1838-39) and The Old Curiosity Shop (1840-41) are other significant works which gave him popularity. Dombey and Son (1846-48) had a more cohesive plot and characters than his earlier works. It is the beginning of Dickens as a more mature writer. David Copperfield, written in first person narrative, comes with Dickens’ mastery over the plot.

Dickens was fearless in experiments and highlighted society’s different themes, ideas and issues. He has shown the corrupt Victorian society in Bleak House (1852-53) and Hard Times (1854). In this series, Little Dorrit (1855-57) is considered one of the most challenging novels that present society’s accurate picture. Dickens has focused on the oppressive natures of class privilege and religion. His other major novels, A Tale of Two Cities (1859) and Great Expectation (1860-61), deal with the French Revolution and corruption. Our Mutual Friend (1864-65) was Charles Dickens’s last completed novel. Overall, Dickens wrote 15 novels, five novellas, edited a weekly journal for 20 years, and hundreds of short stories and non-fiction articles. He also lectured and performed readings. Dickens was an untiring letter writer and an active social reformer. His novels have an outstanding place in the history of English literature.

5.2.3 Works of Charles Dickens

Pickwick Papers* (1836): It appeared in a series before being published as a novel. Pickwick Papers began to publish in March 1836 and continued till November 1837. The central character of the Pickwick Papers is Samuel Pickwick, who is also the founder of the Pickwick Club. In this novel, Dickens discusses a grave subject: the injustice of the justice system. The novel is full of humorous accounts.

Oliver Twist* (1838): It was originally published in serial parts between 1837-39 and in novel form in 1838. The subtitle of Oliver Twist is “The Parish Boys”. In this novel, Dickens shows his concern about the impact of poverty and the shortcomings of the workhouse system. In this novel, it can also be seen how Dickens was disturbed by the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1834 and has highlighted in this story.

Nicholas Nickleby* (1838): The full title of this novel is The Life and Adventures of Nicholas Nich(k)leby. Dickens has shown his outrage at cruelty and social injustice through this novel. His intention behind writing this novel seems to expose the abuses of for-profit boarding schools in England.

The Old Curiosity Shop (1840): This Novel was also published in series between 1840 and 1841 in Mastery Humphrey's Clock. This novel is historical fiction and belongs to sentimental literature- a genre of the Victorian era. The protagonist of the novel is Little Nell Trent.

Burnaby Rudge (1841): The novel's full title is Burnaby Rudge: A Tale of the Riots of Eighty. Here the riots are referred to as the Gordon riots of 1780. This novel is based on this riot. It is not that popular, but Peter Ackroyd- British Historian and Dicken biographer- has said this novel is "one of Dicken's most neglected, but rewarding, novels".

Martin Chuzzlewit (1843): This novel was picaresque and considered classic fiction. It is a comic satire that mocks the 19th-century American culture. It was less popular than Dickens' other works. Still, Dickens considered it "immeasurably the best of my stories." The novel revolves around the Chuzzlewit family, which is greedy, and the family members pursue wealth and status.

Dombey and Son (1846): The work was published in a serial novel that began publishing from October 1846 until April 1848. The novel deals with a tale of a dysfunctional family, whose head is Mr Dombey. He is the businessman who dreams of having a son to take over the family business one day. In this process, he neglects his first child, a girl, Florence. Later on, his only son dies at the age of six.

David Copperfield (1849): David Copperfield is the best novel among the later novels of Dickens. It is considered as Dickens' autobiography. The novel is a severe criticism of the system of teaching run by masters like Creakle and his companions. Dickens suggests many reforms in children's education in this novel.

Bleak House (1852): This novel is also a satire on the abuses of the old court of Chancery, the delays, and the high procedural intricacies which brought miser and ruin to its suitors. The story revolves around the couple Richard Carstone and his cousin Ada Claire.

Hard Times (1854): The novel highlights the evils of industrialisation. Dickens attacked the factory owners and their way of treatments to the workers. He has shown how industrialisation intimidates humans into machines by spoiling their growth and development and curbing their emotions and feelings. The main characters are Gradgrid and Bounderby.

Little Dorrit (1855): Little Dorrit exposes the delay in Government institutions, especially he. Dickens has given reference, particularly to the Circumlocution office and Marshalsea Prison. The protagonist of the novel is William Dorrit. This novel tells the experience of Dickens's father, who had spent many years in Marshalsea Prison.

A Tale of Two Cities (1859): The novel presents the trembling events of the French Revolution. The two cities are London and Paris. Dr Mannet, Sydney Carlton, and Charles Darnay are some of the notable characters in the novel. It is a powerful story that revolves around self-sacrifice, resurrection, hope and death.

The Mystery of Edwin Drood* (1871): The Mystery of Edwin Drood was an incomplete novel. The story revolves around John Jasper. However, the novel's title is on Edwin Drood, his nephew. Drood later disappears under mysterious circumstances.

5.3 Charles Dickens: A Representative Novelist of the Victorian Era

The Victorian era was an age of rapid unrest and mysterious complexity. During this period, the novel made a phenomenal process because it is considered the best medium to portray society accurately. The Victorian age has witnessed rapid and sweeping changes; therefore, the generation of this age has seen so many complexities. A. C. Ward says, "It was an age of Faith and an age of Doubt; an age of Morality, Materialism, of Progress and Decline, of Splendour and Squalor". The two most significant features of the Victorian Age were (i) the development of science and (ii) the progress of democracy. The industrial revolution was another major incident of this age. Although it emerged as a boon for emerging England, it also gave rise to several social problems, which are the inevitable bane of industrialisation. So, the literature of this era was highly influenced by all these elements. The major novelists of the Victorian age were: Disraeli, Trollope, Dickens, Thackeray, Kingslake, Mrs Gaskell and Charles Reade. Almost all the writers of this age show a keen awareness of society in their creativity. Writers like Carlyle, Ruskin, and Dickens have discussed social reforms in their work. Nevertheless, Charles Dickens attacked some legal or social evils in almost all his novels. According to David Cecil, "Dickens is the most representative of the Victorian novelists..." Although we have noted the drawbacks in his novels, "...yet he surpasses them all in his basic humanity, a childlike naiveté and an amazing fecund imagination".

C.E. Eckersley well remarks: "It is doubtful whether any English writer has ever been so popular as Dickens was in his lifetime, popular not only with one class or one generation, but with all classes, rich and poor, young and old alike". Dickens was not of his country alone but of the entire world. He was a favourite writer, and he never suffered from the decline of his popularity.

He was a novelist by profession and is regarded as the greatest novelist of the Victoria era. Many novels by Dickens have been built around a particular social theme. He has effectively criticised his era's social, moral and economic abuses. He was very much concerned for the sufferings and misfortunes of others. His deep awareness of social consciousness merged with the traumatic experiences of childhood. So, in this way, he generated a kind of empathy for the victims of social injustices.

Dickens art believes in art with a purpose. He believed that literature has the potential that can help in social reform. Therefore, Dickens made his novels a medium to highlight such issues so that he could contribute to eradicating social evils. These social commentaries grabbed the attention of common people. Images of orphaned children and prisons would permeate his stories and books throughout his writing career. The other images that can be found in his novels are images of the prison image of a lost child who is somehow oppressed and bewildered. Many of the social evils have been highlighted by Dickens. The various evils of the industrial revolution were focused on by him, especially the employment of child labour, and have been highlighted in his many novels.

The Pickwick Papers, Charles Dickens's first novel, shows England before industrialisation and urbanisation. He created a utopian vision of England in the Pre-Victorian period. However the novel is full of humour, but it is full of social commentaries as well. In Oliver Twist, Dickens presents the protest against the abuses of power, especially on the part of government institutions. In this novel, Dickens depicts an orphan child's life. The character Oliver Twist was born in a workhouse and brought up under cruel conditions; later on, he ran away from that place to London. There he fell into the hands of a gang of thieves, and again, he fell into the hands of old villains. However, he has been saved twice by Mr Brownlow and Mrs Sikes. In this novel, Dickens portrays a life of a child who has run away and how he gets involved in the wrong company but is somehow saved by good people. The novel highlights not only how cruel the world for an orphan child is, but also, at the same time, there are good people and morality is still present. Many social themes are present in this novel. However, the dominant ones are- the abuses of the new Poor Law system, the physical and mental harassment of children and the tribulations of the criminal world.

Dickens' other novel Nicholas Nickleby exposes the weaknesses of Yorkshire Schools and the horrible teaching. In this novel, many themes like- suffering childhood and oppressive institutions like schools and hostels have been discussed. Dickens was very much critical of the education system in the Victorian Age. His novels like Hard Times and Our Mutual Friend also deal with this issue. In Old Curiosity Shop, there is a deep pathos in the death of Nell.

David Copperfield is the best novel among the later novels of Dickens. It is the veiled autobiography of Dickens. The novel criticises the teaching system in schools run by teachers like Creakle and his companions. The incident of Gordon's anti-property riots in 1788 can be seen in Barnaby Rudge. The novel gives a vivid description of the riot that terrorised London for several days. The next issue is the employment of child labour, highlighted by Dickens in this novel. There were no factory laws or trade unions, so the factory owners brutally exploited children for their benefit. The character David is the perfect example of this exploitation. Due to this exploitation, the poor boy suffers a lot. With his sufferings, Dickens has shown the suffering of many a poor and helpless Victorian child. Appalling prison conditions is the next social issue in Dickens's novels. David Copperfield presents a realistic picture of prisoners. Prisons were treated like dumb, wild beasts. The aim was not to reform but to inflict social vengeance on them. They suffered highly in the pathetic conditions of the jail. David Copperfield and Great Expectations also present the condition of jail prisoners, abuse of the legal system and delays in the justice system. Dickens succeeded in focusing attention on many social issues through his novels.

Bleak House, again Charles Dickens' one of finest novels, exposes the maltreatment of Chancery and administrative ineptitude. He has shown that Chancery became synonymous with the flawed law system, court fee expenses, delays in judgements, etc., apart from this, alum housing, overcrowded graveyards, negligence of contagious diseases, corruption during the election, discrimination in education, class divisions, etc., in the novel. This novel portrays an accurate picture of Victorian England. Another novel Hard Times (1845), also focuses on social issues, like class division, education of people experiencing poverty, rights of common people, industrial relations, etc. The novel also deals with contemporary issues like reforming divorce laws. Hard Times is a polemical work dealing with controversial social issues. It focuses on the mid-Victorian society, which was influenced by industrialisation and dominated by the material outlook, ruthlessly hoarding the prevailing capitalists' economic tradition. However, the novel has been highly criticised as Dickens has not provided any remedy for the prevalent issues in England. F.R. Leavis has said, "possessed by a comprehensive vision, one in which the inhumanities of Victorian civilisation are seen as fostered and sanctioned by a hard philosophy, the aggressive formulation of an inhuman spirit."

In short, in his novels, Dickens involves social issues related to child development, his exploitation growth and the role of society in it. Apart from this, Charles Dickens's novels are a great social commentary and played an astonishing role in implementing social policies related to education, children, and poor people. He has not only highlighted most of the issues in his novels but also played the role of great social reformist and critic of the Victorian Period. Dickens aimed to awaken the conscience of his age.

5.4 Charles Dickens as a bildungsroman novelist

Charles Dickens is considered a Bildungsroman novelist. Bildungsroman is a specific form of novel in which 'bildung' means education and 'roman' means novel in German. It was a popular form of the Nineteenth century and was widely used by writers to explore the journey of a man from childhood to maturity. The theme of childhood is central in Dickens' novels. He is also famous for the use of biographical elements in his novels.

After reading his novels, it can be seen how largely he drew on his own experiences of life. His child characters were highly influenced by his childhood. In the beginning, the main character experiences many difficulties and troubles, but in the end, he emerges as an older and wiser person. This can be seen in Great Expectations. The story starts with a boy named Phillip Pirrip for himself and society as Pip. He is the novel's protagonist and narrator, and the story revolves around his actions. In the beginning, he was a young boy having many expectations. By the novel's end, Pip becomes more mature and wiser and realises that there were several moments when he was mistaken in the past. He concludes that he was wrong in considering others as inferior to him. According to Prof. Baker, "Pip's character is Dicken's one serious study of the growth of personality, and, though he lets Pip tell the story, he manages with great skill to bring out the true significance and the humour of the strange situations, without showing his own hand...". So, the character develops throughout the novel, which is a crucial step in understanding the novel.

Like Great Expectations, David Copperfield is another novel that focuses on the life of a young boy, David. Hugh Walker has said about this novel, "The pen which wrote David Copperfield was often dipped in his own blood." This novel contains a large amount of Dickens' autobiography. In this way, other novels of Dickens also present the bildungsroman effect. His early life can be seen in Oliver Twist. School life, his school days and his visit to Marshalsea, where his father was imprisoned, are presented in Nicolas Nickleby. Apart from Bleak House, Little Dorrit presents his life in a law office to treat illegal matters. Hence, these are only some instances, but many more examples could be given. These instances also present his view of looking society from his perspective. He was sympathetic towards poverty, which is why his characters are innocent sufferers of the crime of circumstances and social conditions. In short, his characters are the heart of English society, and somewhere, they somewhat represent his own life experiences.

5.5 Humour and Pathos in Dickens Novels

Charles Dickens is one of the greatest humourists in English Literature after Shakespeare. It is the soul of Dickens' novels. Dickens's characters are inspired by actual human beings. That is why his characters do not remain untouched by human feelings like humour and pathos. Dickens's humour is illuminating and varied in nature. It is widely spread in many of his works. The kind of humour present in his novels develops with the development of the story. It arouses feelings and thoughts and is full of wisdom. Dickens created numerous characters and comic figures in his novels.

The source of Dickens' humour is social manner. However, he is considered a social reformer who advocates the reformation of poor people through his novels with the help of his. His characters show inexhaustible comic spirit, the author's unique talent.

Oliver Twist presents a variety of humour which is satirical, farcical and pleasant simultaneously. The workhouse officials exhibit satirical humour, whereas the farcical humour of Dickens shows his liveliness. Dickens is known for his warm humour. There is a perfect example of farcical humour in Oliver Twist. “Twenty and thirty other juvenile offenders against the poor laws rolled about the floor all day, without the inconvenience of too much food or too much clothing, under the parental superintendence of an elderly female.” Many characters are humoristic, such as the character of Bumble, Fagin, and Artful Dodger. Among these, Bumble is the most humorous one. The best farcical scene is the trial of the Artful. Dickens is the maker of numerous humorous characters and comic figures.

The novel presents various types of humour and is rich in pathos. Martin Chuzzlewit is considered the most remarkable novel in English Literature in terms of humour. R.C. Churchill has said about Dickens’s humour, “In the field of comedy I put Dickens above Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Fielding, and Smollet, though recognising, as he did himself, that he owed much to them.” His comic spirit is inexhaustible and varied. It can be seen in the various characters like Mr Puppy, Mr Pumblechook, Mr Sapses, Mr Gamps, Miss Nipper, etc. These characters are so astonishing and delightful that they hold readers tightly. The absurdity also creates humour. Dickens’s humour can be categorised into parts—satirical and sympathetic. First, he satirises those characters that do unfair deeds. Characters like Mr Bumble and Mr Pecksniff are the symbolises hypocrites, which is why they have been satirised. He puts his language and ridicules his way through the mouth of characters. He has shown his mastery over it. His novels like Oliver Twist, Pickwick Papers, Great Expectations, and David Copperfield are not only full of humour but also have elements of pathos.

Pathos is the following characteristic of Dickens’s novels. The word pathos means suffering in Greek, and humour means the comical side of everything. His humour is inseparable from pathos. His childhood experiences inspired him to give such instances of humour and pathos. Dickens’s stories have such power that readers connect themselves with the characters as he brilliantly expresses the occurrences that affected the life of characters. His novels, like Oliver Twist, present many instances that show the pathetic life of the central character. The story is full of pathos and makes the reader empathise with the characters. He tries to enhance the pathos by adding external elements. However, it can be said that his pathos is not a tragedy. His stories perfectly blend humour and pathos, so they are very close to real life. Since life is neither tragedy nor full of happiness, it is a mixture of these feelings. The death of Paul, the heart-stirring death scene in Dombay & Sons, and the death of Nell in Old Curiosity Shop are some pathetic scenes. The pathos was highly admired by the contemporary writers of the Dickens age, but modern-age critics have criticised it by calling it overdone, cheap, sentimental, melodramatic and maudlin. Albert said, “His devices are often third rate, as when they depend upon such themes as the deaths of the little children, which he describes in detail. His genius has little tragic force. He could describe the horrible, as in the death of Bill Sykes...”. So, this is a solemn obligation on Dickens.

Thus it can be seen that pathos and humour are the dominant part of Dickens’s novels.

- significance of the title and structure of the novel
- the theme of the novel
- characterisation
- summary of Great Expectations

6.1 Introduction:

This unit will introduce you to an analysis of the novel Great Expectations. Throughout the novel, Dickens focuses on class consciousness, childhood experience, crime, and suspense, including his autobiographical experiences and commentary on social and economic conditions in England at that time. This novel presents the tremendous imaginative abilities of Charles Dickens. He has created an elaborate and detailed picture of the different classes of people, which allows the readers to feel the reality of the time. The novel presents an accurate picture of the society of the Victorian age.

6.1.1 Title of Great Expectations:

The title of the novel Great Expectations dominantly refers to the expectations of its protagonist Pip. The expectations of Pip have many dimensions and are ever-evolving. At first, he wanted to become a gentleman and gain a good education and lifestyle. Further, he also expected to get the love of Estella. The Expectations of Pip can be divided into three stages. In the first stage, Pip wants to become a gentleman, but he has no money; in the second stage, when he has lots of money to fulfil his desire to become an educated gentleman and lastly, in the third stage, he wants to get Estella's love.

Miss Havisham expects to take revenge on the male sex, so she trains Estella and makes the tool for her revenge. Then comes Magwitch's expectation. Magwitch was an escaped prisoner, and Pip helped him. Magwitch does not disregard his kindness, and later he helps him to fulfil Pip's expectations. Magwitch donates his money to Pip to make him a gentleman in a complete sense. Hence, his expectation was great.

The title is also ironic. It is because Pip's great expectations, which were almost fulfilled, turn out to be the least important things. The expectations of wealth become why he loses his friend Joe, his true well-wisher, and Estella to Drummle. He also loses Magwitch and is unable to rescue Miss Havisham. So, Pip realises in the end that he has only one expectation: Magwitch's expectation that he has to live up to the convict's expectations of him as the true gentleman he might become given the necessary wealth and leisure. Pip must live the life that Magwitch could never attain for himself.

Structure of the novel

The novel is divided into 59 Chapters. The story revolves around Pip. Readers can find the three different stages of Pip's life in this novel. These might be called: Childhood, Youth and Maturity. The novel begins with the childhood of Pip; the story develops in his Youth and ends in his maturity. As Pip goes through these three stages, his character develops and changes. Every stage represents various aspects of the character and his life in general. Childhood of Pip symbolises innocence, people experiencing poverty, the working class and country life. Youth represents snobbery, upper-class London, whereas the third stage, maturity, represents self-realisation, comfort, and middle class.

6.1.2 Theme:

Charles Dickens discussed multiple themes in Great Expectations, and every theme is important in the context of Victorian society. Themes like class consciousness, ambition and self-improvement, loyalty, true fatherhood, guilt and crime, love, etc., have been discussed in this novel. Class consciousness is the dominant theme that has been dealt with. The characters of Great Expectations are divided into upper class, middle class and lower class. The nineteenth century was when the industrial and agricultural revolutions took place, which became the reason for the emergence of various classes in society. Characters like Miss Havisham, Estella, and Drummle are the characters that represent upper-class society. All these characters are unhappy and unkind, showing Victorian society's upper-class people. In the middle class, Mr Wemmick, Mr Jaggers, and Mr Pump(b)lechook come. In the lower class, characters like Joe, Bidley, Magwitch, Herbert, and Orlick come. The novel's protagonist, Pip, has many ambitions, and he wants to get rid of poverty to become a gentleman. The story revolves around this theme. Apart from this, there are other themes which are also important.

6.1.3 Characterisation:

Dickens selected the names of all the characters with extreme care as he wanted that the sound of the name of the characters should reflect their personality and that gives an immediate idea of what they are like. Some major characters are:

- Pip: His real name is Philip Pirrip. Pi is his short name. The meaning of the word Pip is a tiny seed that grows into something more substantial. He is the protagonist of the novel and also the narrator. He is a lonely, imaginative orphan boy living with his sister, Mrs Joe Gregory and brother-in-law. She treats him poorly because he is an orphan. She calls him “small and flabby and mean”. Nevertheless, he was a poor boy but he possesses a noble heart. Miss Havisham’s interaction in Pip’s life changed him a lot. After visiting her house Satis House, Pip understood his aim, what are his expectations from life. He says, “That was a memorable day to me, for it made great changes in me. But it is the same with any life. Imagine one selected day struck out of it and think how different its course would have been.”

With the passage of time the young common labouring boy turns into a young man with many great expectations and starts behaving like a gentleman. Later on, he receives an unexpected education and wealth. He believed that it is Miss Havisham who is bringing him up as a gentleman and that is why he considered her as an angel. Later on, in the novel his belief gets shattered when he discovered that his benefactor is not Miss Havisham but Magwitch is a kind of self-deception for Pip.

He is passionate, romantic and has many expectations for himself. After getting the wealth he wants to improve himself socially and morally. He has been portrayed in the novel as a true lover who loves Estella since childhood. His love for her beyond materialistic pleasure. He says, he loves her against reason, against promise, against peace, against hope, against happiness. He had firm belief in his love and he believed that his real love will change artificial Estella and a new Estella will come out of it. He was so much in love with her that even at the time of death he wants to remain with her. Hence, the story of Great Expectations is not only the story of Pip’s expectations but also it is a love story of Pip which runs parallel.

Pip has been sincere and honest in his whole life. He was gentle with everyone- his sister, Joe, Estella, Miss Havisham and Magwitch.

- Joe Gargery: Pip’s brother-in-law. He is described as “mild, good-natured, sweet-tempered, easy-going”. He is one of the most representative characters of Dickens’s novels. Joe is the symbol of common poor and honest people. Joe reminds us of the father figure Joseph in the Bible. He is one of the poor soul of all the characters. He is very gentle and far away from selfishness and greed. He always performs his duty honestly and sweet tempered. He loves and cares for Pip a lot, but later on, Pip gets embarrassed by Joe's standards and behaviour when he accompanies him in London. Joe loves Pip and also takes delight in his childish pranks. He always inspires him to read. His behaviour towards him like a mother. Joe also is a good husband who always appreciates his first wife by saying to Pip that "Your sister is a fine figure of a woman". In spite of her rude behaviour. But after her death he became more serious and calm. Later on, he marries to Biddy and Pip admires him by saying to Biddy that "Dear Biddy, you have the best husband in the world". Biddy, Joe's second wife calls "worthy, worthy man." He has been called a "Nature's gentleman"

- Miss Havisham: The manic, wealthy mistress of Satis House, who was deserted years ago on her wedding day, and now she wants to take vengeance against all men. Therefore, in shock, she still wears that wedding gown and keeps a decaying feast on her table. She lives near Pip's House. She surrounds herself with clocks stopped at twenty minutes to nine and keeps a decaying feast on her table.
- Estella: The meaning of Estella is a star which glitters and attracts attention but is simultaneously cold and remote. She is Miss Havisham's adopted ward, beautiful but cold-hearted. Miss Havisham has raised Estella as a tool for her revenge. She trained her how to break men's hearts. She is the heroine of the novel and also the heroine of Pip's heart. When Pip first met Estella, he gives his observation on the question of Miss Havisham that "I think she is very proud...I think she is very pretty...I think she is very insulting." The line shows the true character sketch of Estella.

Minor characters of Great Expectations

- Mr Jaggers: The name sounds harsh and biting. He is a lawyer and guardian of Pip. He is a successful lawyer of London. Miss Havisham and Magwitch, both use his service. He is a mysterious character; however, he was loyal to the duty that has been assigned to him from his client Magwitch. In the beginning when he brings letter to young Pip, it was like a fairy tale. It is not sure whether Pip likes him or not. In the whole novel it can be observed that he has some strange habits which are repeated so often and it suggests that he is uneasy about the work he does.
- Herbert Pocket: A young man of Pip's age. He was a loyal friend of Pip in London. He helped Pip in all his difficulties; even he helped Pip to save his benefactor Magwitch. Although he and Pip shared approximately same age but Herbert is more experienced and mature than Pip.
- Abel Magwitch: The name is made from the combination of 'magic' and 'witch' he is the convict who ran away from prison. He met Pip in the graveyard. He terrorises Pip, but Pip's kindness significantly affects him, and later in the novel, we find that he devotes himself as a benefactor to Pip. He is very grateful to Pip. He wanted to return Pip's charity and compensation and that is why he wanted to make him a gentleman of London. He went to South Wales and changed his name from Magwitch to Provice. There he earned a lot of wealth

Whatever he earns, he transfers his fortune to Pip to improve his social class, and also, he funded for Pip's education through the lawyer Jaggers.

- Arthur Compeyson: The lover of Miss Havisham who left her and never reached the wedding venue. He represents evil character. In the novel, he commits all sorts of crime. Although he was very handsome in appearance but he is ill tempered character. He traps other people for the sake of his profit. His only intention is to earn money through illicit way.
- Mrs. Joe: Mrs Joe is Pip's sister and Joe Gargery's first wife. Her behaviour is not appropriate. She is rude and cruel. She beats her brother Pip. Pip serves her as a 'Connubial missile'. For Pip, she is a common lady and not lovable as a sister should be. He says, "My sister had a trenchant way of cutting our bread-and – butter, "and that, "I knew Mrs. Joe's house-keeping to be of the strictest kind." She is a dictator in her home. She has a snappish way of talking. Even she is not humble and kind to her husband.
- Biddy: The second wife of Joe. She is very sincere in every walk of life. She is pure domestic girl. She is the portrayal of true Victorian womanhood. Pip is very close to her and confesses to her every secret of his life. She is wise and intelligent. Pip praises her by saying that "Dear Joe, you have the best wife in the world, and she will make you as happy as even you deserve to be, you dear, good, noble Joe!" Biddy's intelligence can be seen in this that she advises Pip to stay away from Estella because she is not worth gaining over her. she also taught Pip and Joe how to read and write.
- Bentley Drummle- A clumsy, ill-tempered snob. He dies in an accident with his horse. Estella married to Drummle because their match was made by her guardian, Miss Havisham. He represents the dreadful and exploitative nature of aristocracy. Although he had a small role in the novel but he has a great impact. Pip describes him "stupid brute" and "mean".

There are other minor characters whose name gives the idea about their personality and appearance. Characters like Pumblechook sound silly and ridiculous. The Pocket family resembles wealth, one of the themes throughout the novel. Dickens was famous for his characterisation that reflected the characters' personalities and was often termed a 'Dickensian' character.

6.1.4 Summary of the Novel

The story of the novel revolves around a boy whose name is Pip. He is a young orphan young boy. Pip is the narrator of the story. The time is an unspecified future. Pip grows up and lives with his sister, Mrs Joe, and her husband, Joe Gargery, the gentle and kind blacksmith of the village. One day Pip goes to visit the graves of his parents. There he meets an escaped prisoner, Magwitch. The next night Pip helps the prisoner by giving him food and wine. Here he sees another stranger engaged in a fierce fight with the first man. The second man eventually disappears into the fog. However, the convicted prisoner was recaptured and taken back to prison. He promises to reward Pip for helping him before going to jail. After this incident, Pip continues his life as a poor but honest boy.

One day a messenger comes with the message of a wealthy lady Miss Havisham that she wants to meet Pip. So, Pip is taken to meet Miss Havisham. She insists that Pip often come to play with her ward. She lives in a big mansion called Satis House. She is a maniac who has never left her home.

Moreover, she still wears her wedding gown and hates men because her fiancée never reached the venue. In Satis House, Pip meets Estella, the adopted daughter of Miss Havisham. Miss Havisham has raised her to break the hearts of men. She is the tool of revenge for Miss Havisham. When Pip meets her, she oppresses and mocks him for his poor background. Despite this, Pip's regular visits to Satis House make him fall in love with her. Now he wants to become a gentleman to become a good match for her. Pip starts working in the forge as Joe's apprentice with the money he receives from Miss Havisham, although Pip does not see himself as a blacksmith to educate and improve himself. Later Mrs Joe got severely attacked and became incapable of caring for her family anymore. A new girl moves into the family of Pip.

Several years later, one day, a lawyer named Mr Jaggers, a pompous London lawyer, visits Pip, who is now a young man. Jaggers informs Pip that he has come into a fortune; an anonymous benefactor has arranged for his education. Therefore, he must move to London to improve his living standards to the higher class and improve his education. Pip thinks that Miss Havisham has arranged all this for him and also makes an interpretation that Miss Havisham wants to marry Estella with him. So, Pip travels to London. Mr Jaggers is now his guardian. When he reached his room in London, he met with Herbert Pocket, who also came to live in the same room. He is a relative of Miss Havisham, and she has arranged for his education to make him a gentleman. He is the same boy who met with him in Miss Havisham's home courtyard. Now they are sharing their lodgings. Herbert teaches Pip to act like a gentleman, wearing nice clothes, having good manners and speaking more formally. Pip and Herbert become best friends, and later Pip shares his intense love for Estella with him. Pip also helps him with business by providing him with money. Pip is a quick learner and can now mix with the people of other upper-class societies like Bentley Drummle.

Estella visits London, and because of her beauty and aristocratic manner, a circle of suitors is ready to marry her, including Bentley Drummle. Pip continuously meets Estella and falls in love with her more deeply. Meanwhile, Pip starts feeling that he is being followed. On Pip's twenty-first birthday, it was a dark stormy night when someone knocked on his door. He answers his door and finds a somewhat known face. He was Magwitch. Pip learns about the mysterious benefactor, not Miss Havisham but Magwitch. Magwitch tells him that he has spent many years in Australia. He was transported from England on pain of death should he return. Pip is horrified after knowing the truth because he feels that the money he is using is not good. After this revelation, Pip is horrified. However, Magwitch has made a great sum of money and has risked everything to come back to meet Pip, as he considers him his son. All he wants is for Pip to become a gentleman, something circumstances never allowed Magwitch to do. He is in England under the false name Provice. If the police ever find out, Magwitch's life will get in danger, and Pip's social standing will be threatened. Pip is in a dilemma, and at the same time, he is bitterly disillusioned that his benefactor is not Miss Havisham but Magwitch. Herbert suggests Pip should leave England.

Before departing, Pip visits Satis house to make it confirm with Miss Havisham if she is his benefactor or not. There he professes his love for Estella, but she rejects him. He says-

"I loved her against reason, against promise, against peace, against hope, against happiness, against all discouragement that could be." Pip, Chapter 29, Great Expectations."

Pip warns her about Drummle as he pursues her, but she tells him that she has planned to marry Drummle. Miss Havisham also accepts that she raised Estella to be cold and heartless. After Estella's marriage, Pip again visits Satis House. Miss Havisham apologises for her faults, and unfortunately, somehow, Miss Havisham gets injured in the fire. Pip tries to rescue her, but he is too late, and in this process, he burns his hands, and Miss Havisham dies.

Many things are revealed later in the novel; one is that Magwitch is Estella's father, and her mother is Jagger's strange housekeeper. Compeyson was Miss Havisham's lover. Pip vows to help Magwitch and tries to get Magwitch out of the country with the help of Herbert Pocket, but he fails. In their journey, Compeyson catches up with them in the boat. Compeyson attacks Magwitch, and in this fight, Magwitch kills Compeyson, and he gets severely injured. Police arrested injured Magwitch for this offence again. Pip visits him, who is on his deathbed, and Pip reveals that Estella is his daughter and still alive. Eventually, Pip leaves England for Cairo and becomes a wealthy man.

What happens to Pip and Estella is given in the two different endings of the novel. The original ending and the second ending are quite different. Readers were not aware of the alternate ending till 1874. However, many critics and readers prefer the original ending of the novel as it suits the tone of the rest of the novel. The changes can be seen when Pip returns from England. George Bernard Shaw opposed the revised version of the novel Great Expectations in his revised version published in 1937, and stated that its ending would be enjoyed by only "sentimental readers". In the novel's original ending, when Pip returns to England from Cairo, he finds that Estella has remarried after the death of her first husband. She is a compassionate lady, but her relationship with Pip never grows, and Pip remains single.

Wilkie Collins advised Dickens to give a more conventional ending. So, in the revised ending of the novel, when after 11 years, Pip returns to England, he meets his friends and visits Satis House, finding Estella, now a widow. Her abusive husband is dead, and now she has learned compassion and become a soft-hearted lady. Pip and Estella meet, and Estella asks for forgiveness, and Pip convinces her to leave the ruined Satis House. The couple leaves the ruins together, and in this way, the novel ends.

6.2 Let us sum up

In this unit, we have discussed the novel's theme, title, and characterisation. We have also discussed the summary of the novel. The novel is well-organised, but the title is ironic. The wealth that Pip received from Magwitch seemed great earlier but later turned out to be ashes. The novel is a brilliant commentary on the idea that deadening influence of the past can disturb your present. There are various symbols in the novel. For example, Miss Havisham's mansion symbolises the dead past, which purifies by the flames of fire. The characters are the symbol of upper, middle and lower-class society. The novel's plot is more mean and serious than the other novels of Dickens.

7.3 About the author

7.3.1 Life: Thomas Hardy is one of the major literary figures of the Victorian era. He has tried his hands at novels, poetry, short stories and drama. But he is primarily remembered for his highly pessimistic and soul stirring tragic novels. He was mourned as “the last of the great Victorian.” The Victorian age, was the age of-“sick hurry and divided aims.” This was the age when Arnold thought that he was born between – “two worlds – one dead and other powerless to be borne.” It was the age “where ignorant armies clash by night.” It was this time of great upheaval, disruption, when, illuminating star like Thomas Hardy was born to brighten the horizons of British/world literature.

Hardy was born on June 2, 1840, at “Higher Bock-Hampton, Dorset, a small hamlet in Dorsetshire near Dorchester. This was a small town largely inhabited by working men and agricultural people. His father was also named as Thomas Hardy, who was a master-mason and also a gifted violinist and musician. His mother, Jemima Hardy was a cook for local clergyman before marriage. She was also an accomplished musician. She was the main reason behind Hardy’s early education. She made him to read Dryden’s Virgil, Johnson’s Ressalas, and a popular illustrated history of the Napoleonic wars. He had three younger siblings: Mary, Henry and Katherine. Hardy was a fragile child by birth. He was so puny at the time of birth that he was declared dead by the attending doctor. He survived only by the common sense of the family nurse, who slapped the child till he cried and was restored to life. If the nurse had not done so he might never have come to life to create immortal works. It is, therefore, metaphorically said that Hardy was born with a slap on his face, and he depicts this slap of destiny on the face of humanity in all his major novels.

His mother, Jemima, was well-read and she educated him until he went to his first school at Brockhampton at the age of eight. Later he was sent to an advance school, where he studied Arithmetic and Geography. At the age of twelve he read Shakespeare, Scott and Bunyan, which made the background for many of his later works. He studied for several years at Mr. Last’s Academy for Young Gentlemen in Dorchester, where he learned Latin and demonstrated academic potential. Hardy’s family was not able to pay for university education, so his formal education ended at the age of sixteen. His father placed him under John Hicks, an architect, for training and experience to be a builder. Next sixteen years of Hardy's life was spent as an architect. However, during all these years he was reading literature and classics continuously. He also gained a little knowledge of French, German and Greek. He also studied the New Testament. Architectural training went a long way in shaping his literary skill and balancing the plots of his novels. He moved to London in 1862, and was enrolled as a student at King's College. In 1863, he was awarded prize for architecture, but denied a cash prize. Millgate believes that Hardy became engaged to Eliza Bright Nicholls, a lady's maid in London. He never felt at home in London, because he was acutely conscious of class divisions and his social inferiority. In 1867, he returned to Brockhampton because of his ill health and broke his engagement with Eliza Nicholls. In 1870, during a mission to restore the Parish Church of St. Juliot in Cornwall, Hardy met and fell in love with Emma Lavinia Gifford. He married her in 1874. Emma died on November 27, 1912. In 1914, he married Florence Emily Dugdale, who was 39 years his junior. He remained preoccupied with his first wife's death and tried to overcome his remorse by writing poetry. Hardy became ill with Pleurisy in December 1927, and died at Max Gate (former home of Thomas Hardy) on 11 Jan. 1928. His body was cremated and buried in Westminster Abbey( The Poet's Corner), but as he wished, his heart was removed and buried in his Parish Churchyard at Stinsford in the grave of his true love and wife Emma.

Hardy always recognized, and cherished, the profound importance of his having grown up within a rural community, participated in its seasonal occupations and festivals, and listened to the tale telling and music-making of parents, relatives and friends. With these memories lying buried deep in his soul this magnificent architect and rebellious writer crept silently towards his Paradise Lost.

7.4 Victorian Compromise

G.K. Chesterton coined the term "Victorian Compromise" in his book "The Victorian Age in literature." The term refers to the contradictions between the progress brought on by the industrial revolution, and the poverty, disease and suffering felt by the working classes as a result of this progress. While the middle and the upper classes enjoyed advancement in wealth and quality of life, and reaped the benefits of an expanding empire, the working class suffered greatly. Forced to work into close, overcrowded rooms and poor living conditions workers were often at the mercy of their dangerous jobs in textile mills, mines or railways. Mortality rates were high, and child labour was a common killer, along with disease. It was the triumph of capitalism and the birth of Marxism; it was the age of Darwinian science but also the age of Dickensian romance.

The Victorian Age was a complex and contradictory era: it was the age of progress, stability, great social reforms but it was also characterized by poverty, injustice and social unrest. The Victorians promoted a code of values that reflect the world as they wanted it to be, not as it really was, based on personal duty, hard work, respectability and charity. Respectability was a mixture of morality and hypocrisy, severity and conformity to social standards. It implied the possession of good manners, the ownership of comfortable house with servants and a carriage, regular attendance at church, and charity activity. Philanthropy addressed itself to every kind of poverty, to 'stray children, fallen women and drunken men' and absorbed the energies of thousands of Victorians.

The concept of 'fallen woman' was a fate imposed upon thousands of women by the society with intense concern for female chastity. Sexuality was generally repressed in its public and private forms. In the late 19th century patriotism was influenced by ideas of racial superiority. Since the Victorians, under the strict reign of Queen Victoria, had to compromise many essential features of individuality and modes of expression, the term 'Victorian Compromise' came to be coined and applied to this particular age. As expected, this characteristic of the Victorian era also came to be reflected in the literature of that age. The term Victorian compromise, denotes the conflict between science and religion, poor and rich, revolution and reconciliation, war and peace, educated and non-educated etc. The conflict between science and religion is well-known among these. In the Victorian age, the people were highly conflicted between science and religion. Scientific development conflicted the people in the heart. Especially, Charles Darwin's theory that tells man originated from monkeys. However, religion proclaims that man does not originate from monkeys. Alfred, Lord Tennyson, chief exponent of the Victorian age, says that science should be given a position in its place and religion should be given a position in its place. It means that both science and religion have their own place of importance within this world.

The moral purpose in literature, the Bilden Roman consisted in the doctrine of predestination. Authors like Charles Dickens were supporting the status quo and Oscar Wilde was against the Victorian standards. In the Victorian Age the economic growth of middle classes allowed the birth of this new philosophy, known as the Victorian Compromise. The aim was to save the morality in a material society who lacked of values. New words were: public virtues and private vices, which is the base of Victorian Compromise. The women were forced into unnatural marital roles and considered as a symbol of family values. Thus Victorian Age was a cacophonous clash of contradictions masquerading a compromise.

7.5 Thomas Hardy: A Regional Novelist

A regional novelist is one who portrays the specific characteristics, dialect, customs, topography, flora and fauna and certain other qualities found in a particular region. According to M.H. Abrams "regional novel emphasizes the setting, speech, and social structure and customs of a particular locality, not merely as local color, but as important conditions affecting the temperament of the characters and their ways of thinking, feeling, and interacting."

Thomas Hardy also is a regional novelist. He has created an imaginary country named “Wessex.” He has described the region more accurately and minutely than any other English writer. Wessex stretches from the English Channel in the South, to Cornwall in the west, and Oxford to the north. It is a group of six counties named- Berkshire, Wilt shire, Hampshire, Somerset, Devon and Dorset. Hardy belongs to Dorchester, and he almost immortalize this particular south-western part of England through his creations. Hardy’s childhood was mainly spent in the country and this pave the way of observing him the natural phenomena in an acute and sensitive manner. Through Wessex Hardy presents a beautiful paradox between city life and country life. Hardy got success in making an indelible impression upon our minds by creating a vivid picture of his Wessex. Villagers are far from the madding crowd and their life is away from the confused commerce of towns, and tumult and turmoil of the madding crowd. By creating such full-blooded people who dance and sing, eat and drink, work and make love; and on some occasions they do more desperate things, such as murder and adultery, and moral cheating, he has portrayed his characters with universal appeal.

Regional novel writing started in England in 19th century and this limited the scope of English fictions when compared to the works of Russia. Most of the novels of Hardy are set in Wessex and are confined to this specific region because he was all aware of this area. Though confined to a particular region, Hardy’s novels have a universal appeal because for him what is happening in the Wessex is happening everywhere in the world. Problems faced by the people of this fictional region are the problems of whole mankind. Hardy says in the introduction to A Pair of Blue Eyes that “Castle Botrel” or “Boscastle” is among the furthest westward of all those convenient corners wherein I have ventured to erect my theatre for these imperfect dramas of country life and passions; and it lies near to, or no great way beyond, the vague border of the Wessex kingdom on that side.” Through Wessex, Hardy has imparted a universal appeal to his novels. Hardy wrote of Wessex because life brought him Wessex. His interest is not the typical qualities of Wessex but universal values provided by Wessex. Each of the Hardy’s novels deals with a different aspect of Wessex life. On the very first page of Under the Greenwood Tree, a lone man is placed in juxtaposition to the universe while at the same time the boundaries to his little world or planet are set. Dick Dewy, the main character of the novel, whose actions, along with the demise of the choir, is portrayed to be understood as representative of all mankind. From the very beginning of his career Hardy depended heavily upon the places amongst which he grew up, and upon the people who lived there, for the texture of his novels. He has presented the towns, villages, rivers, hills and valleys of his chosen region in a thinly veiled nomenclature, which any native attached to the place can easily identify. Thus his Casterbridge is Dorchester, his Budmouth is Weymouth, his King’s Bere is Regis, his Wintoncester is Winchester, and so forth.

Hardy is extremely successful in portraying the natives of Wessex with all their tastes, habits, likes and dislikes, happiness and sorrows, beliefs and disbeliefs, success and failures. His greatest success as one of the greatest regional novelists lies in his picturization of immortal characters drawn from the common and lower-class men and women who are deeply rooted in soil and affected by the locality they live in. In this connection Goodman rightly observes 'He is not much interested in middle-class respectability, and not at ease with aristocracy. But his peasants are integral part of the landscape in which they live and move: the characters and the scenery form one organic whole, and they are inseparable without infinite damage to both.' In his first published novel Desperate Remedies (1870), he has imparted some imaginary names to original ones as- The seaside resort Creston in the novel is Weymouth, Froominster historically is the river Froom (now Frome) that runs beside Dorchester, the village Carriford is Hardy's own birth place- parish of Stinsford, Knap water house is Kingston Maurword House, and so on.

In his novels like The Poor Man and the Lady, Desperate Remedies, Under the Greenwood Tree and A Pair of Blue Eyes, he has presented the hills and mountains and rivers that are largely symbolical of Wessex, but it was for the first time that he has used the term "Wessex" in his novel Far From the Madding Crowd (1874). He did so in just only one chapter: Greenhill was the Nijni Novgorod of Wessex.... The great mass of sheep in the fair consisted of South Downs and the old Wessex horned breeds.... The Hand of Ethelberta, though deals largely with urban gentry and their servants but Hardy always has Wessex in his mind. In this novel Wessex is presented as a single county closely equivalent of Dorset. Wessex life is presented in the novel a contrast to London manners and speech. The Return of the Native presents Hardy's imaginative return, passionately and deeply felt to the country which was just outside the backdoor of his birthplace. Egdon Heath has a powerful presence in the novel, but the narrative also provides illustrations of the growing sense Hardy had of the nature of Wessex. The Egdon Heath presented in the novel is the heath on which Hardy played as a child, across which he walked as an adolescent, over which he courted as a young man, is quintessential Wessex. He picturises Wessex farmer in The Mayor of Casterbridge who often regards weather-God as a person hostile to him and bent upon destroying him. Hardy is totally alive to the historic facts of the region he has chosen as a background to his works. Every particle of his creations is completely attached to its historical perspective. Another example from The Mayor of Casterbridge clears the fact 'that even if we dig a few feet we are sure to find some skeleton of a Roman warrior, with its feet touching its abdomen and its vessels buried near him.' Such "Skellington's" are common sight for the Wessex farmers and urchins.

The rural setting is even more strikingly used in The Woodlanders (1887). The novel mainly portrays the rustic characters and their reactions to the fundamental emotions of life in their woodland background. As Simon Gatrell notes in Kramer's The Cambridge Companion to Thomas Hardy, "It is somewhat surprising, in the light of this substantial contextualizing of Wessex, that Hardy chose imaginatively to return in The Woodlanders to an environment as enclosed and isolated as that of, The Return of the Native a world apart of forest and orchard." There are also direct and indirect evidences that Hardy's Wessex was not expanding still beyond the enclosed boundaries of Dorset. The natural market town for the Melburys is Yeovil, but Yeovil is in Somerset, so Hardy makes his characters to go miles out of their way to Sheraton (Sherborne), in order to make sure that they remain confined within the strict boundaries of Wessex.

In “Tess of the D’Urbervilles”, Hardy concentrates on personal emotions and clearly expresses the man’s position in the universe. The novel tells the story of a country girl Tess. She works as a dairymaid in a peaceful and rural setting. Hardy uses a vast canvas to portray village folk’s profession, skills, and the hardships of their lives. The rural setting of the Tess and her working as a dairymaid, her hardships, her dignity of her soul and her struggle against heavy odds all are characteristics of a common man living in the lap of nature which finds its way in depicting Wessex.

In his last novel “Jude the Obscure”, Hardy has presented Jude Fawley, born in Mellstock as an orphan. He is transported to a village whose traditions have been stripped by modernizing Victorianism, a village way outside the old confines of Wessex, though technically within the new bounds of New Wessex. It is the New Wessex in the sense that it pictures newly created geographical boundaries like – Ingpen Beacon, Wyllys-neck, Pilsdon Pen and homely Bulbarrow the use of railways by means of transportation because Hardy’s novels like- Under the Greenwood Tree, The Mayor of Casterbridge and The Woodlanders are set in time before the railways came to Dorset. The railways are presented here as a symbol of the destruction of Old Wessex. The communities presented in the novel are village communities that readers of Hardy are familiar with, are based on trade – like the Christminster stonemason fraternity, or the rootless fair-and-circus fellowship.

To conclude Hardy as a regional novelist his Wessex is not a mere scenic setting for his immortal creations. It is much more than that. Consciously or Unconsciously Wessex has become his personal identity. It is his own creation through which he can see and judge the whole world. His love for nature and the earth is solely a personal feeling. He has created the immortal border lines that incarnate itself in the form of a particular geographical boundary called Wessex, the heart and soul of his fictions and poetry. However he never projects Wessex in a romantic realm. As Duffin observes ‘Hardy nowhere expresses the extreme inference that every flower enjoys the air it breaths.’ It is the nature, the immortal Wessex, its environment and the characters therein that has formed the background of Hardy’s novels giving it the regional note. In the words of David Daiches, “Setting his character in that Southern corner of England he named Wessex, a large agricultural region steeped in history and slow to emerge from the older rhythm of rural life and labour into the modern industrial world....” A hundred years have passed since he finished writing his novels, but their charm and taste remain same. His works are indelible imprints of immortality in the face of time whose glory will never fade.

7.6 Hardy’s Pessimism

Pessimism is an attitude of hopelessness toward life and toward existence, coupled with a vague general opinion that pain and evil predominate in the world. It is derived from the Latin Pessimus, meaning “Worst.” To describe, an attitude as pessimistic need not, however, mean that it involves no hope at all. It may locate its objects of hope and of appraisal in a region beyond ordinary experience and existence. Pessimism is a negative mental attitude in which an undesirable outcome is anticipated from a given situation. Pessimists tend to focus on the negatives of life in general.

Hardy was profoundly influenced by his age and his environments. His period flourished through science and industrial revolution. Industrial revolution was destroying old agricultural England. The destruction of agricultural England was the process through which simple villagers were facing new challenges like – poverty, destabilization, disease and suffering caused by the use of new technologies in farming. Hardy’s pessimism is an outcome of what he saw in his rural community. He closely and continuously observed Wessex folk facing the daily tragedies and their helplessness against the mighty forces. So he draws a gloomy picture of the universe, where man is mere puppet in the hand of malicious fate. Hardy believed that the whole life is an endless saga of suffering. Suffering is the cosmic law and happiness is but an occasional episode in the general drama of pain. The fact that he is often labelled as a pessimist and has no reason why he should not be thus described. Hardy was the painter of darker side of life as it was no wonder if people charged him of “pessimist.” In fact, there are some factors that compel us to believe him as a pessimist. He was hypersensitive; his own life was tragic and gloomy. For a speculative soul, this world is a thorny field. The gloomy effect of his age plays an important role in his writings. Doubts, despair, disbelief, frustration, industrial revolution, disintegration of old social and economic structure, Darwin’s theory of evolution were the chief characteristics of that age. All these factors probe deep into his writings and heighten its somber, melancholic and tragic vision. His poem entitled “The Poet’s Epitaph,” describes life as a “senseless school.” Hardy really suffered regarding love and marriage. He was a frail child with a difficult childhood without money. As a result of it, there is a pessimistic dismal and fatalistic tone in his novels. In Jude the Obscure, Phillotson speaks, “Cruelty is the law pervading all nature and society” and Sue says, “All the ancient wrath of power above us has been vented upon us, his poor creatures and we must submit it.” Hardy totally excludes from his writings the sense of splendor and beauty of human life. He loves his people but he hates life intensely. He sees it in the hands of cruel, blind and oppressive ‘Unknown Will’. In his view the supreme power is blind, imbecile and malevolent who takes joy in killing and torturing his innocent creation,

*“As flies to wanton boys: are we to the gods;
They kill us for their sport.”*

His universe is neither ruled by God, the father, nor by divine spirit. Men are part of great network of cause and effect which make them, almost always, a prey to the chance over which they have no control. The creator of this hostile universe is called the “Immanent Will”, the spinner of Years, Fate, Doom and sometimes God. Hardy was the star son of Melancholy and by temperament he was pessimist throughout his life. He asserted that “tragedy always underlies comedy”. Only a man with inherent pessimistic approach can lay such a forceful emphasis on the idea of tragedy by inserting ‘always’ in such a summary sentence. Hardy is of the view that man suffers from his birth till his death. Not only man suffers, but all nature suffers. Suffering is writ large on the face of nature. He always sees a ruthless brutal struggle for existence everywhere in nature and “Life offers only to deny”. He rejected the Christian belief in a God that is omnipotent, benevolent and anthropomorphic. He rather thinks of Him as malevolent, as one who takes delight in the suffering of mortals. The lack of divine command was the primary cause of Hardy’s dissatisfaction or pessimism. In the novel Tess of the D’Urbervilles, Tess lacks this harmonious order as well. Tess of the D’Urbervilles depicts a hostile universe devoid of a loving God, as does the whole universe. Human pain seems pointless in the absence of a benevolent God. Furthermore, the concept of vengeance becomes meaningless when God is gone. As a consequence, there is no reason to anticipate a favorable result. Born and bred in a rapidly changing scientific age, Hardy could not shut his eyes to the fact of suffering of men of his time. Therefore, the enthusiastic optimism of the Victorian poets like Browning about God, Who sang thus, could not satisfy him. Rather a ruthless struggle for existence everywhere in nature made him to believe that:

God’s not in his heaven: All’s wrong with the world!

He could not satisfy himself also with the view of the romantic poets like Wordsworth who said that Nature had a “Holy Plan” And that there was joy everywhere in Nature. He could not see such joy in Nature when a number of children were born to shiftless parents like the Durbeyfield to bring misery to themselves and to others. Hardy questioned the established moral and religious principles of Victorian society. His pessimistic view of society is derived largely from the philosophy of determinism. Hardy was a determinist who was aware that man's life is controlled by some inexplicable external force, which he sometimes calls the Fate of Circumstances (in The Mayor of Casterbridge), the President of Immortals (in Tess of the d’Urbervilles) or the Immanent Will (in The Dynasts). Man is, according to him, determined by both heredity and environment.

The intellectual climate and the social and economic transformations in the nineteenth century created in Hardy a deep pessimism. Tragic coincidence and the irony of fate are deeply rooted in his vision of life. His pessimism was largely a reaction to Victorian optimism. Hardy's pessimism was outcome of several sources like, popular Calvinism, Darwin's theory of natural selection, Schopenhauer's philosophy, and traditional folk fatalism. In his fiction and poetry Hardy expressed the inability of man confronted with 'the blind forces of nature', and the loneliness of the individual in dehumanized society which had lost touch with timeless and organic order. Hardy expressed his deep pessimism when he wrote about the universal order. He held both a deterministic and tragic view of human existence, accepting the inevitability of suffering and evil. Human existence has little or no sense in absolute terms; its strength lies in individual relative virtue. Virtue is thus man's own reward in this world. In Hardy's view tragedy is created by the blind forces of nature which man opposes in vain. Hardy is a pessimist is true, but out of this dark, grimly dark and gloomy world of his own there is also a brighter side of philosophy. He does not hate mankind like Hobbes who portrays man as a beast, mean, abject, detestable and an odious creature. On close reading of his major fiction, it becomes apparent that Hardy's view of life is not wholly deterministic and pessimistic. He offered, though not explicitly, some resolution of the tragic condition of man. Virginia R. Hyman points out that "by emphasizing the power of chance to affect men's lives, he was also emphasizing the correspondingly increased need for moral responsibility among men." In Hardy's world, which lacks the stability and confidence of Christian belief, man is both a perpetrator and a victim. Hardy was probably the first Victorian writer who gave vent to his existential preoccupations and showed persuasively and penetratingly the sense of loneliness of people living in an uncaring universe and the concomitant evolution of their painful self-consciousness.

Hardy called himself an evolutionary meliorist and realist and denied the charge of being a pessimist. For him being a pessimist is to close eyes to human ills. He was simply recording sincerely, faithfully and truly the impressions of life that he had received from the contemporary society. No doubt, that Hardy, in certain places, showed his optimism for a better human world and existence, but he could not get rid of the label of a pessimist. A critic says: -

"But he is a pessimist and it is as sure as there is a head on your shoulders, my dear reader! His so-called impressions are so numerous: and so, consistent that it is difficult to suppose that a considered philosophy was not at the bottom of them. Impressions are always vague but he is so sure, so definite that we should call his so-called impressions His Convictions".

7.7 Hardy's Projection of Fate and Chance:

Fate and chance play an important role in the works of Thomas Hardy. These are two catastrophic forces who work against the destinies of the characters of the Hardy's novels. His characters are mere puppets in the hands of malignant Fate. His characters are in always direct conflict with their fate. Characters seem to work to one end while fate works to their opposite end. Fate seems to have imposed on men and they are misleadingly guided by it from outside as well as within. David Cecil, a renowned critic comments on the importance of fate as: "A struggle between man, on the one hand, and, on the other, an omnipotent and indifferent Fate — that is Hardy's interpretation of the human scene."

Hardy's characters never have individual life, rather they are governed by fate. It is always the guiding force which leads them to their doom. He is of the view that fate is an indifferent and blind force working against human happiness. It is hostile towards the hard labour and difficulties of men. It is the omnipotent cause of human sufferings. There is no clash between man and man or between man and society, but between man and this disastrous Fate. Those characters who are generally considered wicked and crooked are also the victims of Fate as well as those who are considered good and gentle. Thus, Henchard is full of hatred for Farfrae, Bathsheba thinks Troy as the main cause of her misfortunes. Fate works as a malignant Deity destroying all human efforts to make their lives happy. As in The Mayor of Casterbridge, Fate expresses itself as hostile weather which ruins Henchard. All the characters of Hardy's novels either good or bad are victims of Fate. For example, Alec is as much in the hands of Fate as Tess; Henchard is as much a plaything of fate as Farfrae or Elizabeth-Jane. All are equally subject of pity; none is to be blamed. All characters are bound to circumstances. They are mere helpless victims of blind, cruel, indifferent and all mighty fate.

Chance also plays a crucial role in the novels of Hardy. Chance makes mysterious things happen. These mysterious things are often undesirable and unexpected. Such chance events are heavy blow to the protagonists of Hardy's novels and it make them fall in a pathetic situation at a wrong moment. For example, in Hardy's Tess of the D'Urbervilles, we can see the role of chance presented if Angel returns back fast then he would be with Tess immediately but he fails to return fast. The other chance is if Tess learn from her previous experience with Alec and wait for Angel to return, then she would be with Angel as well. One can observe that Tess' innate flaw results in the wreckage of a chance that she has to be with Angel. The tragedy of Tess at the end of the novel is caused due to the two men including Alec and Angel who forces her to kill Alec. When Angel returns back to meet Tess, she feels betrayed and she stabs Alec to death resulting in an execution. One cannot blame Alec alone himself because if Angel accepted the past of Tess then it would have been different in the beginning itself. If Tess also learnt from her previous incident with Alec, she would have been with Angel happily instead in a situation of killing Alec and in the prison waiting to be executed.

Hardy acknowledges that the use of chance is justified in a work of art. Life is full of chances. "Strange conjunctions of circumstances, partially those of a trivial nature, are so frequent in an ordinary life that we grow used their accountableness." We are unable to know how this chance will work at certain moment, and what will happen to the characters because it is indifferent to man s' sorrow and happiness. Many of the critics are of the view that fate and chance is a dominant force in Hardy's novels and his characters are the victim of cruel fate and chance. In the novel, The Return of the Native Eustacia accidentally meets Wildeve in a dance party. Mrs. Yeobright happens to choose an overwhelming hot day to meet C. Eustacia happens to escape from the heath on a stormy night and they meet their tragedy. Eustacia forces Clym to go back to Paris but he denies to do so and secedes to open a school in the heath. So we see that fate and chance is a dominant force in this novel. It is true that fate and chance plays a vital role in every man's life but it is limited while in Hardy's work overstatement and exaggeration is also seen.

In the works of Hardy, Fate presents itself in the form of Chance and Love. Of these two, Love plays an important part to ruin the characters of Hardy's novels. It makes them to judge things misleadingly and fall a victim of circumstances. Hardy is of the opinion that happiness can be revived in life through love. But on certain occasion even love leads to tragic consequences. Two persons of dissimilar nature are drawn together but soon they stand at different poles. If Eustacia had loved wild eve and Thomasin loved Clym, the tragedy of The Return of The Native would have been avoided. Eustacia's tragedy results from her exclusive love for the glittering city life. But the cruel destiny intrudes her life to spoil her promising career. It is just a chance that Clym is fast asleep and Eustacia does not open the door to Mrs. Yeobright thinking that her husband would do so. It is also by chance that Clym comes to know from the real fact about his mother's death.

All of Hardy's novels are little bit a love story. Love plays a dominant role in the lives of the characters of Hardy's novels. Love as stated by Hardy is a "Lord of terrible aspect, a blind irresistible power seizing on human beings whether they will or not, and always bringing ruin on them." Tess loves Angel Clare passionately. But her love for him brings her off her feet and leaves her neglected and depressed. It is her deep love for Clare that she in spite of her adverse situation marries her. Out of her genuine love she discloses everything to her beloved about her past. The result is disastrous one. Angel Clare is the man with hard "logical deposit." He does not forgive her. He deserts her and Tess pays heavily for her genuine love. At last it is Love again that takes Tess toward her final doom. She, in a fit of desperation stabs Alec and finally was hanged for the act. "Justice" was done, and the President of the Immortals (in Aeschylean phrase) had ended his sport with Tess.

To conclude, the above discussion well brings out the fact that Fate is the dominating theme of all of Hardy's novels. Sometimes it takes the form of Chance and sometimes the form of love. Fate and Chance pursue all main characters as a hunting dog would pursue its prey. All the characters either good or bad are caught in the evil trap of Fate and chance. Hardy's cosmic vision works here. In God's scheme of things, things do not happen in tune with the general expectation. Fate and Chance are unstoppable forces who ruin every positive efforts of human being to make their lives better and comfortable. Hardy believes that there are indeed more things on Heaven and Earth than are dreamt of in man's philosophy.

7.8 Let Us Sum Up

Thomas Hardy, being a prominent literary figure of the Victorian era has deeply felt the pervading impression of the Age – “sick hurry and divided aims.” A small hamlet “Higher Bock-Hampton” with all its natural settings cast a deep impression on Hardy's life and works which latter on resulted in imaginary country “Wessex” in his novels. His architectural training provided him with a keen eye sight to look into the sufferings of man with global perspective. His characters of the novels for the most part are the agricultural people rooted deep in the soil. The calm and quiet surrounding of the rural life is the chief concern of his books. His “Wessex” is dealt with in so masterly a manner that it has become an immortal region. Hardy has fascinated several generations of readers, both men and women. He is a realist who listens, meditates and tells the stories; stories that are connected with the endless saga of human sufferings and helplessness against the mighty forces of fate and chance. In the context of modern literary world he remains a writer who entertains soul because a tragedy gives delight to the soul.

8.4 Summary of the novel:

The novel is divided into seven phases. The first phase is named – Maiden. It is the beautiful, but tragic story of Tess of the Durbeyfield. The story is set in Wessex. At the very beginning of the story we meet Jack Durbeyfield or John Durbeyfield. He is a poor haggler. He lives in a cottage almost outside the Village Marlott, in the beautiful vale of Black moor in Wessex. He is the head of the family called "Durbeyfield." He has to earn bread for eight family members who are: Joan (his wife), Tess (daughter), Eliza Lousia (daughter), Abraham (son), Hope and Modesty (daughters) and two younger sons. One evening Jack is returning from the town of Shaston after selling his eggs. He meets a Parson named Tringham, who calls Jack “Sir John.” Tringham tells him that Durbeyfield is the corrupt form of the D’Urberville and he is the descendent of the D’Urbervilles, an ancient, noble and knightly family who had land holdings as far back as William the Conqueror in 1066. Upon this discovery, Jack thinks that the royal blood should not live a life of poor haggler. He throws his articles and goes to the Drop Inn, the wine shop. Next morning he is unable to take his cart of fodder to the city. Tess is now sixteen and being eldest child presents herself to take the cart of fodder to the city. It was dark when she started and on the way in an accident with a mail-cart their beloved horse Prince dies. It is not the death of a horse but the death of bread earner of the family. Her mother suggested Tess to go to very rich Mrs. D’Urbervilles and ask for help.

The second phase is named – Maiden No More. While visiting the d’Urbervilles at The Slopes, Tess meets Alec d’Urberville, who finds himself attracted to Tess. Alec arranges for Tess to become the caretaker for his blind mother's poultry, and Tess moves to The Slopes to take up the position. While in residence at the d’Urbervilles, Alec seduces and rapes Tess. Tess returns home, gives birth to a son, Sorrow, the product of the rape, and works as a field worker on nearby farms. Sorrow becomes ill and dies in infancy, leaving Tess devastated at her loss.

The third phase is named The Rally. Now Tess makes another journey away from home to nearby Talbothays Dairy to become a milkmaid to a good-natured dairyman, Mr. Crick. She has now completely embraced the work of a dairymaid and performs the routine work at dairy. This section introduces Angel Clare, the youngest son of the Vicar of Emminster, Reverend James Clare. It also reveals Angel’s infatuation with a lady during his wanderings to seek a career at London. The lady being older than him proves to be a flirt. Anyhow he overcomes his infatuation and returns home. He then, concentrates on farming and joins Mr. Crick’s dairy at Talbothays. Here he meets and falls in love with Tess.

The fourth phase is named – The Consequence. In this section Angel proposes Tess to marry. At first she rejects his offer being conscious of her past experiences. She tries to resist Angel's pleas for her hand in marriage but eventually marries Angel. He does not know Tess' past, although she tries on several occasions to tell him. After the wedding, Tess and Angel confess their pasts to each other.

The fifth phase is named – The Woman Pays. After the confession to each other Tess forgives Angel for his past indiscretions, and expects forgiveness from him for her past. Angel comes to the conclusion that Tess is more sinned than sinning. He agrees that it does not happen on account of Tess. He also admits Tess’s several attempts to disclose the matter before marriage. But he does not forgive Tess for having a child with another man. Angel suggests that the two should split up, with Angel going to Brazil for a year and Tess going back home. Tess agrees and returns to her parent's house. Tess eventually leaves home again for work in another town at Flintcomb-Ash farm, where the working conditions are very harsh. Here Tess is reunited with some of her friends from Talbothays, and they all settle in at Flintcomb to the hard work routine. Tess is determined to see Angel's family in nearby Emminster but loses her nerve at the last minute. On her return to Flintcomb, Tess by chance sees Alec again. He is now a practicing evangelical minister, preaching to the folks in the countryside.

The sixth phase is named – The Convert. When Alec sees Tess, he is struck dumb and leaves his position to pursue her. Alec follows Tess to Flintcomb, asking her to marry him. Tess refuses in the strongest terms, but Alec is persistent to marry her at any cost. He thinks that this marriage will console and redeem him of his sin. Tess returns home and finds her mother recovering from her illness, but her father, John, dies suddenly from an unknown ailment. Now the burden to feed hungry mouths falls on Tess' shoulders. Destitute now and homeless (they have been evicted from their cottage), the Durbeyfield's have nowhere to go. Tess realizes her economic condition and thinks that she cannot resist Alec's money and the comforts her family can use. Furthermore, Alec insists that Angel will never return and has abandoned her — an idea that Tess has already come to believe herself.

The seventh phase is named – fulfilment. In this section, Angel returns from Brazil to look for Tess and to begin his own farm in England. When Angel finds Tess' family, Joan informs him that Tess has gone to Sandbourne, a fashionable seaside resort in the south of England. Angel finds Tess there, living as an upper-class lady with Alec d'Urberville. In the meeting with Angel, Tess asks him to leave and not return for her. Angel does leave, resigned that he had judged Tess too harshly and returned too late.

After her meeting with Angel, Tess confronts Alec and accuses him of lying to her about Angel. In a fit of anger and fury, Tess stabs Alec through the heart with a carving knife, killing him. Tess finds Angel to tell him of the deed. Angel has trouble believing Tess' story but welcomes her back.

The two travel the countryside via back roads to avoid detection. Their plan is to make for a port and leave the country as soon as possible. They spend a week in a vacant house, reunited in bliss for a short time. They are discovered, however, and the trail ends at Stonehenge, the ancient pagan monument, when the police arrest Tess and take her away.

Before she is executed for her crime, Tess has Angel promise to marry her sister Liza Lu once she is gone. Angel agrees and he, along with Liza Lu, witnesses a black flag raised in the city of Wintoncester, signifying that Tess's death sentence has been carried out. The two, Angel and Liza Lu, leave together, and the tragic tale of Tess ends.

8.5 Plot Construction of the novel:

A well-constructed plot is essential for a novel. A novel must have a “plot” and a “story” – the action should be governed by a single idea, a visible idea and one of which the essential story is the result. For the construction of his plots Hardy follows Henry Fielding. Hardy’s novels have a structure, a design, a plan, a framework which is definite not loose. These plots are dramatic in quality; nothing superfluous is inserted in them. By training and profession Hardy was an architect, so he imparted an architectural design to his plots. He was a superb master in constructing his plots. He builds his plots as a mason or an architect builds a house. Among all the great writers of the English novel, Hardy alone has, in equal proportions, great gifts of imagination and extraordinary powers of invention.

Hardy’s narratives moves at a slow pace at first and he takes great pain to make clear the spirit of the country, with its daily routine. When the work is done, the play hurriedly delves into passions and begins to move at a rapid pace. Then, the actors come into conflict, there is a strong attraction and repulsion, “spirits” are finely touched” then, there is a period of waiting, a breathing space, an ominous stillness and pause till, at the last, with increased force and motion, it goes forward to the “fine issues”. The final grandeur is the logical climax of converging trivialities. In each separate incident there is an element which proves necessary in the completion of the whole.

Tess of the D’Urbervilles starts when Tess is about sixteen or seventeen and continues to the age of about twenty-one. Hardy uses epic form to describe Tess’s life during this period. There is a continuity of events when we first meet her until she dies. In the long run of the story novel tells us Tess’s actions and justification of those actions, her trials and tribulations, and her efforts to overcome the circumstantial will against enjoyment. Other characters, no doubt, also come into our notice, but what remains significant is the character of Tess. No subplot is added to the story which interweaves with the main story, only Tess’s story is important.

The plot of the novel is one of the simplest that Hardy ever devised: the woman sins, the woman pays. This type of plot was used by number of Victorians, but in the hands of Hardy this pattern was formed into a work of art. Hardy denies and challenges two traditional themes (1) the stain of unchastity can never be erased and (2) the pious possibility of purifying atonement.

Hardy’s plots primarily denote action, because he sees life as a series of action. Life reflects action and action propagates life. His plots are not meant for the pleasure of the readers. He employs the fantastic and surprising elements to his plots that strikes the imagination of the reader. Chance and coincidence, play such a large part in his plot construction that at times they seem contrived.

Regarding Hardy’s plots Neil in his book A Short History of English novel, has pointed out that “His plots are, for the most part, simple. The passions he depicted are the elemental, of love, greed, jealousy, ambition, the thirst for power and knowledge, and the springs of action that move his characters are psychological....” Hardy’s favourite theme is love. He builds his plots around this theme solidly. One of his greatest novels The Mayor of Casterbridge is the only exception to the use of this theme. But in all other novels, the plot rises from the fact that two or more men love one woman, or two or more women love one man. The eternal triangle is always present in his novels. This triangle is very simple in Tess of the d’Urberville.

Tess is loved by both Alec and Angel. The plot of Tess is superbly simple without any complexity in action. It suggests Hardy’s mastery and control on the various elements of plot. But in other novels, though the plot is simple, this triangle is comparatively complex. Cazamian observes, “His plots are not simple. They grow out of elementary passions; ambition, greed, love, jealousy and the thirst for knowledge; and the springs which move them are psychological. More and more as he progresses in his career Hardy tends to shift the construction of his novels to the inner world; he writes a moral drama, shows us a conflict of contradictory wills, guided themselves by feelings. But the development of these conflicts is crossed at every moment by accidents which interrupt them. Ironically, malevolent, fatal chance is, as it were, an invisible third party in all the relationships of human beings; now it seems to express an obscure cruelty lurking in the universe now, in a more philosophical guise, it is the experimental revelation of laws which probability demands that they should be some day crushed. In this latter sense, chance becomes the chastisement of the unavoidable selfishness of every life. Whether one aspect or the other is prominent, the repeated working of the inimical luck is largely responsible for the tragic atmosphere which Hardy’s heroes succeed rarely in escaping.”

Another minor defect in Hardy is that he is not very inventive. He does not invent many types of plots. Most of his plots are based on one situation and that is love.

“But these failures in the management of his plots matter less in Hardy than they would in any other novelist; they are botches, but they do not ruin the work, because though large enough when measured in terms of plot they are small when seen against the vastness and the strength of the design behind the plot. Plot in Hardy is his attempt to express the significance of the great design in purely human terms. Failure was almost inescapable for Hardy, as a man of his time and place, had no completely adequate myth through which his view of the nature of things could be bodied forth.”

In spite of these weaknesses Hardy remains a superb master of plots. His greatness in this sphere is unquestionable. A.C. Ward observes, “Though the architectural structure of his plots may have been overemphasized, he certainly had the architect’s ability to deal with massive structures. His best novels are built in grandeur, and he was truly impressive in his power to communicate the brooding spirit of great places of Egdon, of Stonehenge, of the Vale of Blackmoor. His most memorable characters, also, are conceived on the grand scale. Though Tess is a broken peasant girl, she is immense in her power of endurance.”

8.6 Tess as a social chronicle:

Hardy is a social commentator who comments critically on the pervading conditions and ills in Victorian England. He is a Victorian realist examining the social constraints on the lives of those living in Victorian England, and criticizes those beliefs, especially those relating to marriage, education and religion, that limited people's lives and caused unhappiness. Such unhappiness, and the suffering it brings, is seen by poet Philip Larkin as central theme in Hardy's works. Going through his novels and literary texts, we find that he was criticizing deliberately the absurd norms of Victorian society. He always expressed his dissatisfaction with the rigid moral code in the Victorian age. The rigid moral code refers to the set of strict moral and social standards that governed the behavior and expectation of individuals in society. It encompassed a range of values and beliefs that were deeply ingrained in the cultural fabric of the time. In Literature the rigid moral code was often depicted and critiqued. He spoke against sexual purity and suppression of sexual desires in his novels. The concept of conformity and non-conformity was described in the sense of moral prejudice in the Victorian era. It is a matter of debate that why Hardy is so much affected by the gender roles and biases at that age. Victorian society enforced rigid gender roles, with clear expectations for men and women. From a traditionalist point of view, men were expected to be strong rational, and assertive while women were depicted as daughters of nature submissive to husbands and devotees to domestic principles. Sexual topics were considered taboo and discussion or portrayal of these taboos was heavily censored. In Victorian Society, religion played a major role to design and shape to religious consciousness of humans. Society placed great importance on religious observance moral righteousness and the pursuit of spiritual salvation Literature often Portrayed Characters wrestling with religious faith, moral dilemmas and the conflict between personal desires and religious expectations. This Victorian moral code emphasized social hierarchy and class differentiation Right to vote for the upper class and landowner while the lower class was often seen as stigmatized, marginalized, and judged. Susie Steinbach wrote about this age and said that this was characterized by a class-based society a growing number of people able to vote a growing state and economy and Britain's status as the most powerful nation in the world. Thomas Hardy was a stern realist and many writers and critics of this age labeled him “Victorian Commentator” because Hardy examines and evaluates the social constants on the lives of those living in Victorian England. He criticized those beliefs, especially relating to marriage, education and religion that limited people's lives and caused unhappiness. Hardy was always against the rules of the story which bounded human freedom. He was always critical of the boundaries of class. Thomas Hardy reveals many significant acts of criticism of Victorian society in his three great “ Wessex” novels including Far from the Madding Crowd, Tess of the d’Urberville, and Jude the Obscure. Despite scientific advances and industrial progress, Hardy must criticize Victorian England. In his novel “Far From Madding Crowd”, he wrote that by marriage woman becomes the husband’s property, but if the woman wants to be married she has to accept it.

As in many of his other works, Thomas Hardy used Tess of the d'Urbervilles as a vessel for his criticisms of English Victorian society of the late 19th century. The novel's largest critique is aimed at the sexual double standard, with all the extremities and misfortunes of Tess's life highlighting the unfairness of her treatment. Society condemns her as an unclean woman because she was raped, while Angel's premarital affair is barely mentioned. Angel himself rejects Tess largely based on what his community and family would think if they discovered her past. Hardy saw many of the conventions of the Victorian age as oppressive to the individual, and to women in particular, and in Tess's case the arbitrary rules of society literally ruin her life.

Even the title of the novel challenges convention. Because it was traditional at the time to see Tess as an “impure woman,” the title's addendum “A Pure Woman Faithfully Presented” immediately reveals the author as his protagonist's defender against condemnation. By delving so deeply into Tess's sympathetic interior life and the intricate history of her misfortunes, Hardy makes society's disapproval of her seem that much more unjust. There is also a satirical thread running through the novel's social commentary. The emphasis on ancient names is played to absurdity with John Durbeyfield's sudden pretensions upon learning of his ancestry, and the newly rich Stoke family adding “D'Urberville” to their name just to seem more magnificent.

Written toward the end of the Victorian era, Tess of the D'Urbervilles reflects the confusion of Thomas Hardy’s changing society. The novel explores not only the hypocrisy of England’s moral standards, but also the nature of that country’s changing agricultural economy. As an inhabitant of a rural village himself, Hardy relates from firsthand experience a tale of the declining landed gentry and rural communities undergoing turbulent events.

Hardy’s novel takes place in southwest England, a rural region in which he was born. In real life, farm wages remained low here partly because this region, in contrast to the middle and northern parts of England, had little industry. Without factories to compete for workers, the farm employer did not feel pressed to raise wages. Circumstances grew especially grim for farm workers toward the end of the 1800s. One result was that it grew harder for women to find work in the fields; another was that the income earned by women in rural industries (for example, dairying, glove making, or plaiting straw) became vital to family survival.

While there was little industry in southwest England, life there was nevertheless affected by inventions and developments in the nation. The early 1800s had witnessed the growth of mass transportation. With villages more readily accessible to one another, trade within the nation boomed. Railways transported goods in a matter of hours instead of days. For many country dwellers, this meant an increase in commerce and trade. The dairy industry grew rapidly because fresh milk was now able to survive a quick daily journey to towns hundreds of miles away. In Hardy's novel, Tess finds plenty of work on a dairy farm although her own village suffers an agricultural slump; this seeming contradiction is explained by the boom in transportation.

Other industrial developments affected rural life as well. There is an episode in the novel that involves Tess's employment at a steam threshing machine, which causes her suffering. The machine requires several workers to perform small repetitive tasks for hours at a time. Tess, placed on the platform with the machine and rick (cornsack), unties each sheaf given to her before it is seized by the man who feeds it to the machine. Introduced as early as 1803, the steam threshing machine was no longer new by Tess's day; in fact, Hardy was probably drawing on his memory of it to create the scene. It was once thought that such scenes reflected his sorrow at the passing of old rural ways (in this case, the flailing of corn by hand with a wooden tool to separate it from the stalk). But as one biographer suggests and the not-so-new threshing machine indicates, such a scene may instead be showing Hardy's nostalgia for and "normal attachment" to the environment of his youth. In any case, the scene exposes a few of the rural hardships of the era.

Some of these hardships were suffered by the rural industries. Though the invention of better methods of transport benefited a number of rural industries, it brought a decrease in productivity for others. Once goods could be more easily shipped in from distant areas, most village craftsmen, such as shoemakers and carpenters, lost their business to the cheaper, more efficient factory labour of the towns. This decline in job opportunity drove many young workers from the country into the city.

The departure of its youth upset not only the economic structure of the countryside, but the social one as well. Firstly, there was a change in the landowning class. In reaction to the agricultural decline of the period, the old gentry abandoned lands that had belonged to their families for several generations. Almost 6 million acres of agricultural property would change hands in the early 1900s. The majority of this land came from the breakups and sales of old family estates. In the process, as is the case with the D'Urbervilles, to whom Tess may be related, these once-powerful landowners lost not only their estates but also their economic and social influence.

Despite the ominous foreboding of this decline, English villages did not turn into ghost towns during this period. Newcomers arrived, but in localities that had once boasted only three surnames in an entire village (in other words, had been occupied by only three families), these new arrivals unleashed great commotion. Suddenly news of popular trends and current events from the big cities began to reach the previously isolated villagers. Most of newcomers hailed from England's middle class. They built new homes, brought urban tastes to the rural areas, and replaced the figure of the landed country squire with that of the wealthy modern businessman. Old pastimes, such as the folk dancing in which Tess participates at the opening of the novel, soon seemed outdated. More disciplined activities like English football (known in America as soccer) replaced these archaic recreational pursuits. Yet despite the losses it suffered, the English village also benefited from the influx. The rural standard of living improved, and communication with other regions increased. Furthermore, country living gained a new attractiveness. With the population boom in the cities, the close-knit community and calm surroundings of the country village seemed a commodity worth having.

In the novel, the character Angel comes from a traditional middleclass family that, not surprisingly, expects the youngest son to marry a woman of similar socioeconomic status. When he announces that he has found "a woman who possessed every qualification to be the helpmate of an agriculturist, his mother's initial response is to ask, "Is she of a family such as you would care to marry into—a lady, in short?" As reflected by her question, marriage, in the eyes of the Victorian gentry, served as a union of more than mere love.

In the Victorian era most members of the upper classes obtained their earnings from their land. As the Victorian era progressed, land holding, grew more and more difficult to maintain as one parcel. In time, primarily because of the advent of foreign economic competition, there was a general collapse in British agriculture, as wool, grains, and other products could be obtained cheaply from foreign sources. Many of the gentry were forced to sell off their acreage and thus looked to marriage to provide them with the necessary means of survival.

The minimal relevance of love in marriage was further reinforced by Victorian ideas of sexuality. One medical textbook claimed that sexual indulgence "not only retards the development of the genital organs, but of the whole body, impairs the strength, injures the constitution and shortens life. As a topic, sexuality did not arise in the company of polite society. Even with the sanction of marriage, the experts warned that excess should be avoided, "and sensual feelings in the man gradually sobered down. Given such restrained ideas about sexuality, Angel's outrage toward Tess for her past sexual encounter in the novel seems more understandable. This is not to say, however, that Victorians had no sexual feelings or unapproved relations—only that they hid them from view. While health manuals of the age did warn against excess, they also warned that abstaining from sex altogether was as harmful to one's health as overindulging in it. And the prevalence of prostitutes indicated that Victorian men did not, in fact, abstain. In the novel Angel confesses his own "eight-and-forty hours' dissipation with a stranger." It seems that what Victorian men often deemed as improper at home they actively sought on the streets or, as the novel demonstrates, in the woods. Meanwhile, society expected women of the upper classes to be passionless creatures and ascribed sexual longings only to lower-class females.

The law, like other societal institutions of the era, also treated women unfairly. Although England legalized divorce in 1857, its limited scope enabled men to divorce their wives more easily than women could divorce their husbands. For instance, while a husband could file for separation on the ground of adultery alone, a woman needed to prove both adultery and cruelty or desertion by her husband. And if a woman sought redress by getting a divorce, she often found herself socially ostracized for her efforts. In any case, whether the man or woman filed for separation, grounds for divorce remained difficult to prove, and the termination of the marriage was often not granted. When in the novel Tess tells Angel that she had once been raped, she assumes that with this knowledge, he would be able to divorce her should he wish to do so. He replies, however, in a most definitive tone, "Indeed I cannot." The rape occurred before the marriage and so did not constitute a violation of it. Although the qualifications for divorce expanded in 1868, the procedure nonetheless still proved to be arduous.

Women also suffered inequality in marriages of the time. There existed no common ground. Upon marriage, a woman surrendered all assets over to her husband; until the late 1880s, she held no legal claim to her own belongings. Women who did not marry were hardly better off: in Victorian society, an unmarried woman was regarded as a failure in some way. The commonplace belief was that a woman's place was in the home, and in any case, most women could not afford, in the financial sense, to leave it.

Hardy's novel comments on the difficult position of the Victorian woman. Although Tess attempts to make moral and wise decisions throughout the book, she remains bound, by virtue of her gender, to the role of the social deviant. Society shoulders her with blame for becoming the victim of sexual assault and calmly accepts her husband's desertion of her on the basis of this knowledge. The full title that Hardy gives the book, Tess of the D'Urbervilles: A Pure Woman Faithfully Presented, attests to the author's sympathy for the plight of his heroine.

From religion to economic and social details, Tess of the D'Urbervilles brings alive changes of the late Victorian era. In religion, for example, a reactionary movement against laxness in the Church of England had sprung up in England during the 1700s. It was a back-to-the-Bible movement, spearheaded by John Wesley, whose followers separated from the mainstream to form the Methodist Church. Its focus on hellfire and damnation made outsiders identify it as a grim, fanatical sect. Yet it persisted into the 1800s, in which the writings of various novelists, Hardy among them, showed strong disapproval for the sect. In Hardy's novel, the villainous Alec d'Urberville becomes a preacher for a Methodist group (the "Ranters"), an experience that fails in any way to redeem his base character.

Shifts in England's rural economy and social order likewise surface in the novel. While the early 1800s had seen great herds of sheep and cattle driven to market, the advent of the railroad made this kind of transport unnecessary. Rather than raising cattle, or corn, or sheep for various purposes, it became possible, in fact, to devote a farm entirely to dairy products, as Tess's workplace does. Tess explains this one day as she and Angel Clare drive some milk cans to a train, observing that Londoners would drink the milk at breakfast on the morrow, a formerly unheard-of feat. Railroads, in other words, made specializations such as dairy farming possible by quickly transporting perishable goods.

Tess's family, of course, belongs to the lowest group of rural laborers. When her mother was a child, such laborers had often stayed on the same farm all their lives, renewing their lease from one generation to the next. As the century passed, however, the rural focus shifted to large-scale farming, another consequence of new transportation and mechanization. One result was that instead of renewing leases, as had been the custom, landowners would now send cottagers packing when their leases expired, a calamity that befalls Tess's family. In the end, Tess herself "spends her brief life as an itinerant farm laborer, working here for a dairy farm, there cutting turnips—but always moving on when the season is over and the task is done. We are made witness in the tale of her life to the story of an itinerant laborer whose own destruction is meant to mirror the disappearance of the traditional English countryside.

*Although the subtitle of Tess of the D'Urbervilles, "a pure woman," suggests that the novel relates to the fortunes of its heroine only, it actually covers a much larger theme than the destiny of an individual character. Through the individual tragedy of Tess, the novel's heroine, Hardy has depicted the larger theme of the destruction of English peasantry. More than any other novel in English between Fielding and Hardy, it is this novel which has the quality of a social document. It is, in fact, what is characterized as the thesis.*

The thesis here is that the disintegration of the English peasantry, or the agrarian way of life, having had its beginning in the eighteenth century, reached its final and tragic stage in Hardy's own time. The process began with the extension of capitalist farming much before Hardy's time. The capitalist farming is done by the landowners, not for their own sustenance, but for profit. In this system, the land-workers became wage-earners. The worst hit by this system were the old yeoman class of small-holders or peasants. They had been used, for centuries, to a settled life of continued family occupation of farming, having a culture of their own, living an independent life. With the arrival of capitalist farming, with big players to buy lands from small-holders and cultivate it for profit, making the occupation of farming a business and an industry, this peasant class of yeoman was bound to disappear. The new forces of industry and business were too strong for these poor people. It disrupted the age-old traditions, and gradually destroyed them. Since the way of life of the English peasantry has been deep-rooted, its destruction was highly painful and tragic. Tess is a powerful story and symbol of the destruction of this traditional way of life. Tess Durbeyfield is a peasant girl, who belongs to the stock that was under threat of disintegration at the time. Her parents belong to a class ranking just above the farm-laborer's. It is a class, as the novel explains, "including the carpenter, the smith, the shoemaker, the huckster, together with non-descript workers other than farm-laborer's; a set of people who owed a certain stability of aim and conduct to the fact of their being life-holders, like Tess' father, or copy-holders, or, occasionally, small freeholders." The theme of disintegration is indicated right at the beginning of the novel. We find that already the Durbeyfield's have fallen on bad days. Their plight is by no means solely due to the lack of stability in the characters of John and Joan. The family's condition is made worse by the accident in which their horse gets killed. This accident, as Kettle points out, is a "striking symbol of the struggles of the peasantry." The mail-cart "with its two noiseless wheels, speeding along these lines like an arrow" runs into Tess' slow, unlighted wagon. The peasants, driving their carts without light, were often found on the wrong side of the road.

The moral commentary running through the novel insists that Tess is not at fault in imposing mythological, biblical and folk imagery on a story of a young girl seduced and abandoned to create a "challenging contemporaneity". It was controversial and polarizing, setting these elements in a context of 19th-century English society, including disputes in the Church, the National School movement, the overall class structure of English society, and changing circumstances of rural labour. During the era of first-wave feminism, civil divorce was introduced and campaigns were waged against child prostitution, moving gender and sexuality issues to the forefront of public discussion. Hardy's work was criticized as vulgar, but by the late 19th century other experimental fiction works were released such as Florence Dixie's depiction of feminist utopia, The Story of an African

Farm by Olive Schreiner, and Sarah Grand's work The Heavenly Twins. These raised awareness of syphilis and advocating sensitivity rather than condemnation for young women infected with it.

To conclude, the above discussion well brings out the fact that Hardy's Tess of the D'Urbervilles provides social commentary on many issues prevalent in Victorian society. Hardy's purpose in the novel was to criticize the flaws of the Victorian Era through the life of an innocent young women. The Victorian Era was a rigid time where everything had strict rules. Tess's life was an ongoing battle of tragedy after tragedy to demonstrate the danger of the industrial revolution.

8.7 Hardy's Art of Characterization:

An essential factor in the workshop of any good novelist is characterization. Without extensive knowledge and deep penetrating insight into human nature it is impossible for any novelist to have got any success in the portrayal of characters in his works. The novelist places before us certain typical or significant types of humanity and thus exhibits their nature under the stress of circumstances. Hardy's greatness in this direction is seldom questioned. He is the creator of a large number of unforgettable characters like, Jude Fawley, Gabriel Oak, Angel Clare, Michael Henchard, Henry Knight, Clym

Yeobright, Giles Winterborne, Donald Far Frae, Tess, Bathsheba, Elizabeth Jane, Elfride, Eustacia, Ethelberta, etc. The variety of his character is immense: his command over human personality is extensive. It is all, "a gallery of everlasting delight."

Hardy chooses his characters from the lower strata of society because he believed that while the character and actions of people from high society are concealed by conventions, the rustics are free from any such control. Hence in their case character is fully revealed and can easily be portrayed. Thus Thomas Hardy excels in the portrayal of simple, elemental natures. His female characters are better and more forceful than his male characters because women are more elemental, nearer to nature, than men. Thus, his range of characterization is limited. His characters are universal and deal with universal passions of man. His characters are common human beings with common human weaknesses and virtues. They commit sin as common human beings would commit, but they are considered mean. Male characters in his novels especially in Tess of D'Urbervilles are not complex but are rational in thinking while women are portrayed as always passionate and they love their lovers passionately. Hardy's stories sometimes are love stories. They set a theme as D.H Lawrence used to believe that "if you step outside your circle you will die."

All his important characters belong to Wessex and to the lower strata of society. When he stays out of Wessex or attempts to portray complex characters drawn from the upper classes of society, he fails miserably. But this does not mean that his characters have only a topical or local interest. He deals with the universal passions of man and so his characters are universal in their interest. They appeal to people of all ages and countries. One has to think only of Henchard, Clym, Tess, Eustacia, Giles, Marty South, etc., to realize the truth of his statement.

Hardy's characters are made of solid flesh and blood, as we see Clym and Eustacia, and we get the feeling that we have actually met the various persons whom Hardy portrays in his fiction. They are recognizable human beings and their conversation, actions, irritations, annoyances and quarrels perfectly convincing.

It has been said that Hardy's great success is with subtle characters. But the fact is that his men and women are the most vividly realized when they are simple, primal characters: rustics such as Grandfer and Christian Cattle, sturdy countrymen like Diggory Venn.; passionate wayward women such as Eustacia and plausible rogues such as Wildeve. Apart from that, the character of Mrs. Yeobright has been vividly portrayed. Her love for her son is her most outstanding quality. With it, she combines strength and firmness of mind, a shrewdness, and sagacity. She has a practical mind especially in her assessment of Eustacia. Her opposition to her son's educational plans shows her narrow-mindedness.

The portrayal of male characters by Hardy is admirable; he perhaps succeeds ever better in the treatment of men than women. This choice of his characters leads him away from intellectual complexities which delight most novelists. If his best characters are not subtle, the art that describes them is surely one; for he can record the minutest fluctuations of emotional experiences. The portrayal of Clym is much less complex. His aversion to materialistic and fashionable life of Paris, his great love for her mother, his decision to be a school teacher and educator and his acceptance of his misfortune all make him a convincing character. The delineation of his character has superbly been made by Hardy. Hardy produces a matchless character of Diggory Venn who represents the honest, steadfast, devoted, self-sacrificing and selfless lover safeguarding the interests of his former sweetheart. Hardy has drawn his villain in a commendable way in the novel. The conduct of Wildeve arouses disgust in our minds. He is depicted as casual, irresponsible, selfish, pleasure-loving and even callous. He plays with the hearts of girls, marries one of them and runs away. He has attractive manners and amiable nature. He partly redeems himself by sacrificing his life for Eustacia.

Hardy introduces each of his principal characters with a vivid description of his personal appearance. The Reddleman is described "as young and, if not exactly handsome, approaching very near to handsome." Wildeve is quite a young man. The grace of his movement is singular. It is "the pantomimic expression of a lady-killing career." Eustacia is "full-limbed and somewhat heavy and soft to the touch as a cloud. She has pagan eyes, full of nocturnal mysteries."

One of the important aspects of Hardy's characterization is the contrasting portraits of his characters. There are three female characters in the novel; Eustacia, Mrs. Yeobright, and Thomasin. Eustacia loves her passion more than people and her desire for dramatic life results in tragic consequences. She deceives her husband and tries to leave the Edgon Heath with Wildeve in order to fulfill her desires for living in Paris. Mrs. Yeobright loves her family very much but disagrees to her son's plans to live in the Edgon Heath and ultimately meets a tragic death. In contrast to Eustacia and Mrs. Yeobright, Hardy portrayed the character of Thomasin, an innocent Heath girl who never learns to think pragmatically. She is a noble lady deceived by her husband Wildeve but she remains loyal to him till his death. After the death of Wildeve, she marries Diggory who loved her a lot.

Clym, Diggory, and Wildeve are three major male characters in the novel Hardy portrayed in a narrow range. Clym is contrasted with both Diggory and Wildeve. Clym Yeobright is the protagonist of the novel and a successful merchant in Paris. However, his idea of improving Heath and marrying Eustacia proves disastrous for him. Wildeve, the villain of the novel, marries Thomasin but falls in love with his former beloved Eustacia and while eloping with her, meets a catastrophic end. In contrast to Clym and Wildeve, Hardy depicted the character of Diggory Venn, a Reddleman, who loves Thomasin Yeobright. In spite of her rejection, he remains loyal to her and helps her in her problems. At the end of the novel, he succeeds in marrying Thomasin. There are contrasting ends for each of these major characters as Clym loses his wife, Wildeve deceives his spouse and Diggory gets his love.

Another notable feature of Hardy's art of characterization is the dominance of heroines more than heroes and these heroines ultimately meet the terrible end. Eustacia is the most powerfully-drawn woman in Hardy's portrait-gallery. Her selfishness, her charms, and beauty, her uncontrolled passions do not blind us to her celestial imperiousness. Hardy suggests that she is a goddess in her power. She has a femme fatale in her power to arouse passions in others and Cleopatra in her pride, her passion and her scorn of consequences. She is Hardy's greatest creations whom no reader is likely to forget. She herself is responsible for the tragedy that befalls her. These are the factors which put her to tragedy: Her unsatisfied longing to be taken to Paris and her Hatred of Heath are the main factors governing her fate. She was attracted towards Clym simply by the hope that she would be taken to Paris. She was also aware of his deficiencies and she frankly confessed to Clym that she didn't have the makings of a good house-wife. But she also told him that she loved him and that she could sacrifice her dream of Paris for him, "To be your wife in Paris would be heaven to me, but I would rather live with you in a hermitage here than not to be yours at all." In spite of this, her desire of Paris never perished. Her reaction to Clym's furze-cutting, her renewed interest in Wildeve, her failure to open the door, and her final decision and death are all the factors which contribute to her tragedy. Eustacia's own weaknesses and lapses play a large part in bringing about the tragedy. Her love of gaiety and fashion, her worldliness and incapacity to appreciate her husband's lofty nature, and her inconsistency are the powerful factors.

Another powerful female character Tess is a sensitive, passionate and earthly figure. What is of enduring charm in Tess of the d'Urbervilles is, in the words of Irving Howe, "the figure of Tess herself." Tess as she is, a woman made real through the craft of art, and not Tess as she represents an idea. Marvelously high-spirited and resilient, Tess embodies a moral poise beyond the reach of most morality. Tess is that rated creature in literature: goodness made interesting". It is her love and loyalty before which all adverse criticism of her acts of omission and commission seems pointless. She is often shown as a hunted animal or a "bird caught in a trap, but she is certainly not defenseless and helpless as that. She has "powers of survival and suffering", the mental as well as physical energy to manage herself with faith and courage and remain unsubdued and unbroken in spite of her many injuries and defeats. She is Hardy's greatest triumph of a simple, peasant girl not only going under in the face of continued onslaughts of misfortune but also warding them off with equanimity, till the very end. To quote Irving Howe again:

"A victim of civilization, she is also a gift of civilization. She comes to seem for us the potential of what life could be, just as what happens to her signifies what life too often becomes.....At least twice in the book Tess seems to Hardy and the surrounding characters larger than life, but in all such instances it is not to make her a goddess or a metaphor, it is to underscore her embattled womanliness.”

In delineating the various characters, Hardy makes use of the natural environment in which these characters live. Egdon Heath is not only the scene of the story but also dominates the plot and determines the characters. It can also be viewed as an antagonist in the story, working against the key characters to bring about their tragic fates. Mrs. Yeobright, exhausted by her long toil to Clym’s house, collapses in the darkness on her return and is bitten by a snake. Wildeve and Eustacia both drown as they plan to flee the heath forever. Clym becomes a preacher, extolling the virtues of a world beyond the heath.

Only Thomasin and Diggory, who are truly at ease with their surroundings, endure. The Heath is a place for lasting sentiment, not fiery passion or intellectual ideals. Those who are able to tune to its rhythms and pace remain. Those who feel they can live beyond their power are destroyed by it. Eustacia views it as an explicit antagonist and says "Tis my cross, my shame and will be my death". Most of all, the Heath is an expression of Hardy's tragic sense, which suggests that time and the world have little use for the squabbles of humans and will thereby negate their efforts time and again.

Hardy’s minor characters such as Captain Vye, Timothy Fairway, Humphrey, Sam, Susan Nonsuch, Johnny Nonsuch, Olly Dowden, Charley, and Christian Cantle are sons of the soil, real children of the earth. They are representatives of antiquity. They perform the function of the Greek Chorus in the novels of Hardy. They comment on the action and people and tell us of what has happened off the stage. They provide a norm by which to judge the main characters of his novels. Often they are the spokesmen of Hardy himself and express his views on life. They appear in groups and generally remain in the background. They, too, are unforgettable and unique in their own way and constitute much of the charm of his novels. When they are absent, as, from Tess, even the best of his novels lose something owing to their absence.

To conclude, Hardy's characters are all human beings, with common human folly and virtues. They are neither saints nor angels nor unredeemed villains. His characters may have some faults; they may have committed sin but they are never mean. We never hate them; we love them despite their faults. They are grand even in the faults they might commit. They have a conscience, and they are torn within themselves when they do some wrong deeds. On the whole, Hardy has been regarded as one of the greatest creator of ever forgettable characters. He is ranked with great novelists like Scott and Dickens.

8.8 Character Sketch of the Major characters:

Tess:

The novel's protagonist Tess is a perfect portrayal of ideal womanhood. She is beautiful, loyal young girl. She is the member of impoverished family called Durbeyfield, living in the village of Marlott. She belongs to the category of Shakespeare's tragic heroines like Desdemona and Cordelia. She is the child of Nature and daughter of Mother Earth. She is well aware of her responsibilities and commits herself in doing the best she can for her family. She is a round character, because she grows from a simple country living girl of sixteen into a complex woman in four or five years only. Intelligent, strikingly attractive, and distinguished by her deep moral sensitivity and passionate intensity, Tess is indisputably the central character of the novel that bears her name. She is an obedient daughter and wife. She is a loving sister and mother. She suffers and dies for her parents, brothers and sisters. She is always trying to solve the economic problems of her family. As such, she goes to Trantridge and loses her chastity. In order to save her family from starvation she has to surrender her body to Alec again. But she is also more than a distinctive individual: Hardy makes her into somewhat of a mythic heroine. Her name, formally Theresa, recalls St. Teresa of Avila, another martyr whose vision of a higher reality cost her life. Other characters often refer to Tess in mythical terms, as when Angel calls her a "Daughter of Nature", or refers to her by the Greek mythological names "Artemis" and "Demeter." The narrator himself sometimes describes Tess as more than an individual woman, but as something closer to a mythical incarnation of womanhood. He says that her eyes are "neither black nor blue nor grey nor violet; rather all these shades together," like "an almost standard woman. In part, Tess represents the changing role of the agricultural workers in England in the late nineteenth century. She has passed the Sixth Standard of the National Schools. She does not quite fit into the folk culture of her predecessors, but financial constraints keep her from rising to a higher station in life. She belongs in that higher world, however, as we discover on the first page of the novel with the news that the Durbeyfield's are the surviving members of the noble and ancient family of the D'Urbervilles. There is aristocracy in Tess's blood, visible in her graceful beauty, yet she is forced to work as a farmhand and milkmaid. Thus, Tess is a symbol of unclear and unstable notions of class in nineteenth-century Britain, where old family lines retained their earlier glamour, but where economic status is more important than inner nobility.

Beyond her social symbolism, Tess represents fallen humanity in a religious sense, as the frequent biblical allusions in the novel remind us. Just as Tess's clan was once glorious and powerful but is now sadly diminished, so too did the early glory of the first humans, Adam and Eve, fade with their expulsion from Eden, making humans sad shadows of what they once were. Tess thus represents what is known in Christian theology as original sin, the degraded state in which all humans live, even when—like Tess herself after killing Prince or succumbing to Alec—they are not wholly or directly responsible for the sins for which they are punished. This torment represents the most universal side of Tess: she is the myth of the human who suffers for crimes that are not her own and lives a life more degraded than she deserves.

Tess is the archetypal anti-heroine. That is, she does not win major battles or influence political decisions; instead, she inhabits her own small world and tries to cope with the fate that life has provided her. By the end of the novel, she is a complete, whole character, but the scale of her influence in her own world, Wessex, is small indeed. Nonetheless, Tess has heroic qualities that make her worthy of our admiration. These qualities are most evident in the following scenes: when she baptizes her infant son, Sorrow; when she endures the tortures of Alec's violation and Angel's abandonment; and when she finally and irrevocably rids herself of Alec's influence. Thus, Tess is a heroine, but on an everyday, ordinary scale.

Tess is a simple country girl/woman who had a basic education growing up, but had little exposure to the wiles of the world outside Marlott. She has curiosity that goes beyond her basic education, as demonstrated when she debates religious and moral issues with both Angel and Alec. Her weakness is her innocence; she is unschooled "in the ways of the world" and therefore unable to protect herself. Tess chides her mother for not telling her full truth about a less-than-kind world: "Why didn't you tell me there was danger in men-folk?"

Throughout the novel, Hardy develops Tess as a character and describes her simple beauty. She is attractive to all men, and even her attempts to change her appearance are not enough to hide her natural beauty. Further in the story, Tess is depicted as a person of near divine qualities when she baptizes Sorrow before he dies. Hardy calls the effect on her siblings as a "transfiguring effect" and that she looked "with a touch of dignity which was almost regal." Tess' beauty is balanced by her earthy elegance, and this is especially evident when she is being courted by Angel at Talbothays:

Minute diamonds of moisture from the mist hung, too, upon Tess' eyelashes, and drops upon her hair, like seed pearls. When the day grew quite strong and commonplace these dried off her; moreover, Tess then lost her strange and ethereal beauty; her teeth, lips, and eyes scintillated in the sunbeams and she was again the dazzlingly fair dairymaid only, who had to hold her own against the other women of the world.

However, behind that beauty Hardy paints a picture of a tortured mind. Tess could not be described as an exuberant person; she seems to border between marginal happiness to deep depression. And her personality is hidden, like an enigma, even from those close to her. Joan, her mother, says in response to a question Angel asks, ". . . I have never really known her." Early in the novel, we see that this statement is foreshadowed when John remarks about Tess, "Tess is queer."

Fate plays a predominate role in what happens to Tess. The acknowledgement of the role of fate is summed up by the locals in the small town as "It was to be." Even Tess realizes that she and her family are in a tough spot when Prince, the family horse, is killed and she must go to the Stoke-D'Urbervilles for financial recovery. Joan, Tess' mother, realizing that her daughter has suffered several devastating blows by Alec says, "Well, we must make the best of it, I suppose." Tess is resigned to accept Alec's proposal near the end of the novel when she tells Angel, "I don't care what he [Alec] did with' me!" Her own safety and happiness are of no consequence to her. Even when she must atone for murdering Alec, she accepts the inevitable as she is arrested for Alec's death — "It is as it should be." That is, she knows her attempt to avoid prosecution and ultimate death are futile, and she must accept her fate. She does so willingly.

Tess is able to bear great burdens placed upon her at a young age. She is between the ages of 16 and 23 when we read her tale. This ability to undergo so much at such a young age builds her character so that we see her as a powerful force in the novel. She accepts blame for Prince's death; the death of her infant son, Sorrow; the loss of Angel and the destruction of her marriage; as well as her killing Alec with her own hands and leaving home three times in her life to "test the waters of the world" outside her village.

She is unselfish in her actions towards others, as when she suggests to the other milkmaids at Talbothays and Angel, that Izz, Retty, and Marian are all more acceptable for marriage to Angel than she is. The other milkmaids at Talbothays cannot harbor any ill feelings toward Tess, as she is the one bound to marry Angel. Thus, she becomes a character with no discernable negative qualities.

Also, Tess is passionate in her love for Angel and her hatred of Alec. She strays from her marriage only when it appears that Angel may not return to her from South America and when there is no other way to help her destitute family. When she discovers Alec's duplicity, she makes her mind up that this will be his final deception of her.

The martyr-like passion of Tess engenders the readers' sympathy. She makes several attempts to rectify her "mistakes": the vow to Angel to end their marriage; her offer to kill herself to free Angel from their marriage; and, her refusal to ask Angel's parents for any additional money during Angel's sojourn to Brazil. She is determined to be self-sufficient and willing to sacrifice her well-being for the good of others. This makes her selfless and on a morally higher ground than other characters in the novel.

Tess' greatest weakness is for her family, particularly her brothers and sisters, and it is this weakness that Alec exploits to great effect. Her journeys to The Slopes, at the beginning of the novel, and her subsequent return to Alec near the novel's end, are all predicated on her willingness to undergo great pains to make her family's life better. Alec promises financial aid to the Durbeyfield family several times, to which Tess cannot be objected.

To conclude, Hardy's immortal character, Tess, comes before us like a goddess in the form of a woman who has to linger long in our memory. She strikes our memory several times like that of sweet Desdemona or gentle Cordelia. She has such magnificent qualities that we are unable to forget her at any step throughout the story. She is the most influential part of the novel. Without her, we cannot imagine such a splendid story. Her struggle against the cruel social norms, her efforts to make her life better, her passionate love, her endurance, purity of her heart and soul, her beautiful and charming personality, her self-sacrificing nature, are some common traits that are closely associated with us in our day to day life. That is why we are so closely attached to this magnificent character. Undoubtedly, Hardy has painted an unbleached, blank canvas for us, with so many colours that is ever forgettable to us in any respect. Thus, Hardy paints a grand portrait of a well-rounded character in Teresa Durbeyfield.

Angel Clare:

Angel Clare is the unheralded protagonist of the novel. He is an intelligent and idealistic son of the parson named James Clare. He adopts agriculture for study, and remains skeptical of religion. He is out of the ordinary course of human nature. He is a bundle of contrasting opposites or contradictions. Thomas Hardy has put himself to a great extent into the form of Angel Clare. Like Hardy he has no fixed aim for his material future. Tess, Izz, Retty, and Marian all fall in love with him at Talbothays, but he chooses Tess as his beloved. He loves an idealized, "child of nature" version of Tess, however, and is shocked to learn about her past sexual experiences (even if they were done to her rather than of her own volition). Angel cares more than he would like about the approval of his family and society, and he rejects Tess despite his own sexual indulgence in his past. He goes against what the family had intended for him, a career in the ministry, like his father and brothers. Instead, Angel pursues a career that seems opposite of what his family would like for him — farming. His education comes from his schooling and from his personal experiences. He seems more in tune to the true nature of religion, but in a more practical sense, unlike his university-educated brothers. Farming puts Angel on a level with the common folk who inhabit the rural English countryside. Angel arrives at Talbothays to educate himself in the workings of a farm and falls in love with a dairymaid, Tess. Angel enters the novel at the very beginning, as the nameless young man who dances with the girls of Marlott and then disappears, nameless to the girls and readers. He reappears at Talbothays, when he is 26 and Tess is 20. Angel is a good man. He begins his relationship with Tess by offering to tutor her in history or any subject of her choosing, to make up for her lack of higher education. She gently refuses, but he cannot help but fall in love with this gentle girl. His gentlemanly ways also come to the fore when he offers to carry all four dairymaids over a swollen creek when the girls are on their way to church. It is a perfect excuse for all of the girls — Izz, Retty, Marian, and Tess — to get closer to their desire, Angel Clare himself. He is sincere in his search for a good, hard working woman who will be a help to him on his own farm. His choice of Tess seems an obvious one to him. However, his family has chosen Mercy Chant, a fine lady and woman, to be his bride. He is disappointed in their choice because he has no need for a frilly lady on a farm; instead, he must have a wife willing to work the same jobs and hours as himself. Angel chooses Tess without ever having his family meet her.

He is an egoist, because he stands firmly on and gives supreme importance to his own opinions, thoughts and principles. Angel detests old families and makes his views known to others. Tess hears of his views and thinks that her future with Angel may be cut short if he learns of her ancient lineage. When he does learn of her family history, he does not make a big issue of her heritage. He seems likely to have more of an issue with his own views of love and marriage. Angel adheres to Tess' wishes when she asks him to leave her. He observes her from a distance, not making any overtures that could be misleading. He waits several chapters to proclaim his love for Tess and waits for her response. He finally convinces her of his intentions to marry her, but his views of love and marriage seem to have very little flexibility: "Yet Clare's love was doubtless ethereal to a fault, imaginative to impracticability." His weakness is his impractical, idealistic love of Tess. He later regrets his rashness and quick decisions and strives to make up to Tess.

Like Tess, Angel has a past, when he was nearly led into a relationship with a woman in London. When Tess relates her own tale, he seems to have forgotten his own lurid tale and denies Tess the forgiveness that she so willingly grants him, thus indicating a flaw in Angel's character: his intractability. This flaw sets up the reason for Angel to reject Tess as a wife and begin his excursion to Brazil.

Angel's life is characterized by quick decisions that are not well thought out and organized. He seems reasonable but makes decisions based on impulse, not rational thinking: his quick proclamation of love for Tess, his intent to go to Brazil, and his asking Izz to accompany him to South America. He sees the errors of his ways and regrets his past declarations: "Viewing her [Tess] in these lights, a regret for his hasty judgment began to oppress him." He seems to have thought out the association with Tess, and the loss of a future life with Mercy Chant. He later asks Tess for forgiveness — "Tess! Can you forgive me for going away?" But he exhibits the kind of decisions that ordinary people make in everyday situations. He promises to take care of Tess after she kills Alec and to make Liza-Lu as his wife after Tess is gone, and he lives up to that promise. Thus, Angel is a character likeable to most readers. Angel is Hardy's voice of agnosticism and the views of religious "freethinkers," those who reject of "the tenets and traditions of formal religion as incompatible with reason." The movement looks to associate with religion but without its formal ties to a church per se. Angel could be identified as a deist; that is, he sees God as a creative, living force, but he rejects formal religion. We see this when Hardy writes, "Angel preferred sermons in stones to sermons in churches and chapels on fine summer days." He chose Tess for her ability to be a good wife for a farmer, not for her religious views. Says Hardy, "Angel never would have made orthodoxy a condition of his choice." When describing Tess to his parents, Angel makes a point to tell his parents that Tess is a good Christian woman. Angel has cleared the last obstacle with his parents and returns to Talbothays to convince Tess to marry him. Thus, Angel represents the practical, no-nonsense facet of religion that Hardy himself would have championed.

Angel is a secularist who yearns to work for the "honor and glory of man," as he tells his father, rather than for the honor and glory of God in a more distant world. A typical young nineteenth-century progressive, Angel sees human society as a thing to be remolded and improved, and he fervently believes in the nobility of man. He rejects the values handed to him, and sets off in search of his own. His love for Tess, a mere milkmaid and his social inferior, is one expression of his disdain for tradition. This independent spirit contributes to his aura of charisma and general attractiveness that makes him the love object of all the milkmaids with whom he works at Talbothays. As his name—in French, close to "Bright Angel"—suggests, Angel is not quite of this world, but floats above it in a transcendent sphere of his own. The narrator says that Angel shines rather than burns and that he is closer to the intellectually aloof poet Shelley than to the fleshly and passionate poet Byron. His love for Tess may be abstract, as we guess when he calls her "Daughter of Nature" or "Demeter." Tess may be more an archetype or ideal to him than a flesh and blood woman with a complicated life. Angel's ideals of human purity are too elevated to be applied to actual people: Mrs. Durbeyfield's easygoing moral beliefs are much more easily accommodated to real lives such as Tess's. Angel awakens to the actual complexities of real-world morality after his failure in Brazil, and only then he realizes he has been unfair to Tess. His moral system is readjusted as he is brought down to Earth. Ironically, it is not the angel who guides the human in this novel, but the human who instructs the angel, although at the cost of her own life.

To conclude, Hardy's character Angel changes several times throughout the novel, Tess of the D'Urbervilles. Hardy explores Angel's character by portraying him as being a nameless character. This character seems to be not affected by traditional society values in Victorian times. This character is one of the major characters that retreat into the cruelest conventional outlook. Through narrative viewpoint and dialogues, Hardy built more depth to Angel's character that seemed to have abandoned all his starting characteristics with only a glimpse of it towards the end. Hardy's realistic writing style shows that even the "hero" of the book has flaws that almost resemble the villain's and therefore the readers grasp the reversal of characteristics of Angel and Alec D'Urberville as their conflicting relationships go on with Tess throughout the novel. Further, we may add that one's living environment and experiences have a great influence on the development of an individual's character. Only as we experience all kinds of hardships, can we realize the most valuable thing which is always neglected when we have it while we regret when we lose it.

Alec D' Urbervilles:

An insouciant, foolhardy twenty-four-year-old scoundrel, heir to a fortune, and bearer of a name that his father purchased, Alec is the nemesis and downfall of Tess's life. He sins and the wages of his sin is death. His first name, Alexander, suggests the conqueror—as in Alexander the Great—who seizes what he wants regardless of moral propriety. Yet he is more slippery than a grand conqueror. His full last name, Stoke-d'Urberville, symbolizes the split character of his family, whose origins are simpler than their pretensions to grandeur. After all, Stokes is a blunt and inelegant name. Indeed, the divided and duplicitous character of Alec is evident to the very end of the novel, when he quickly abandons his newfound Christian faith upon re-meeting Tess. It is hard to believe that Alec holds his religion, or anything else, sincerely. His supposed conversion may only be a new role he is playing. This duplicity of character is so intense in Alec, and its consequences for Tess so severe, that he becomes diabolical. The first part of his surname conjures associations with fiery energies, as in the stoking of a furnace or the flames of hell. His devilish associations are evident when he wields a pitchfork while addressing Tess early in the novel, and when he seduces her as the serpent in Genesis seduced Eve. Additionally, like the famous depiction of Satan in Milton's Paradise Lost, Alec does not try to hide his bad qualities. In fact, like Satan, he revels them frankly. He bluntly tells Tess, "I suppose I am a bad fellow—a damn bad fellow. I was born bad, and I have lived bad, and I shall die bad, in all probability." There is frank acceptance in this admission and no shame. Some readers feel Alec is too wicked to be believable, but, like Tess herself, he represents a larger moral principle rather than a real individual man. Like Satan, Alec symbolizes the base forces of life that drive a person away from moral perfection and greatness.

In reality, Alec is not a d'Urberville at all; instead, his family was named Stoke, then Stoke-D'Urberville, and later just D'Urberville. His father had made a fortune in north England and had settled in the southern region of the island. He adopted a local name to blend in with the historical association of place. Alec woos Tess with his suave talk and conspicuous wealth. Alec's motives are clear from the beginning: to seduce Tess for his own gain. It could be argued that even after seducing Tess, Alec does indeed fall in love with her and makes his plans to have her as his own a second time. Alec is friendly at first, using his charms to lure Tess back to The Slopes for a second visit. When she returns to become the keeper of Mrs. D'Urberville's poultry collection, Alec uses scare tactics to force Tess to plead to him for relief. The wild ride to Trantridge in the cart is indicative that he will use any means to convince her of his power.

The scene of Tess' first visit, with Alec, feeding Tess strawberries is very sensual and suggestive. A scene like this would have caused more than a few Victorian eyebrows to be raised. Hardy made a point to include such a scene early in the novel to pique the reader's response to the novel. Sex was not a usual subject for a book, and Hardy delivers in his first section lust, sex, and seduction. Tess is no match for Alec. Whereas she is naïve and inexperienced, he is worldly and sophisticated. While she is burdened with the responsibility of providing for her family, he feels an obligation to no one but himself. Alec wears the young girl down to take advantage of her, but she continues to rebuff his advances at every opportunity. It is not until he rescues her from a fight with other Trantridge workers that her fate is sealed. Sensing a chance to have Tess, Alec purposefully becomes lost in a journey through the woods. He rapes Tess while she sleeps awaiting his return.

Alec does not appear in several Chapters. Nevertheless, we cannot say that he doesn't impact the story during these chapters. First, his earlier actions (specifically the rape) impact everything that follows. But his impact is not simply confined to the readers' understanding of the part he has played in Tess' current situation. Hardy brings Alec back to the story through Reverend Clare, who shares with his son (who later shares with Tess) Alec's conversion and ministry. Alec returns physically to the book as a street minister.

Alec is a "sunshine convert," renouncing his newfound faith as soon as he sees Tess again. Using twisted logic, Alec accuses Tess of causing him to stray from his ministry, "But you have been the means — the innocent means — of my backsliding, as they call it." He soon cannot suppress his passion for Tess, calling her a "temptress." Hardy notes that "The corpses of those old fitful passions which had lain inanimate amid the lines of his face ever since his reformation seemed to wake and come together as in a resurrection." Tess feels some guilt for Alec's plight, and he uses the situation to his advantage again, making her swear to leave him alone at a place called "Cross-in-Hand," the scene not of religious conversion, but of conversion to the ways of the dark side, with Satan.

Alec further lures the unsuspecting Tess by talking her out of remaining true to her marriage to Angel. He will not accept her rejection of him. He is relentless, and he is able to finally sway Tess by catering to her poor family. Alec takes full advantage of Tess at this point, and he convinces her to live with him as a D'Urberville. Thus, Alec has persuaded Tess to live a life of sin. This deception results in his death when Tess, enraged, stabs him.

In the novel, Alec is undoubtedly a bad man, a rapist and a con artist, but he does, in the end, pay to the uttermost farthing, as Tess kills him—thus setting herself up to pay high price as well, but Angel gets away with the damage he has done. Alec represents bad habits that may leave, but they always come back to haunt us. From a woman's perspective, there's no wonder why Tess kills him in the end because that is the only way to get him out of her life for good. Thomas Hardy's development of Alec D'Urberville begins with a misleading physical description that leads to an equally deceiving personality. The shady features of Alec's figure mirror his questionable character. His pretentious claim to the D'Urberville name reflects his equally hollow religious conversion. His adamant temperament and resentment merely lie hidden beneath a shallow coating of religion. Once he abandons this religious yoke, he throws all of his energy into capturing Tess, the tragic end of an empty soul.

8.9 Let Us Sum Up:

Thomas Hardy holds a unique position in the field of world literature. He is the master of the realist drama. Being a keen observer of nature and natural phenomena he creates characters grown in the lap of nature, common and simple people. The first quality of Hardy as a novelist is his wonderful gift of developing characters in his novels. No critic has ever doubted Hardy in this respect. The characters of Hardy are true to life. He has not painted the idealistic aspects of life through his characters. When we come to the realism in his novels, we are surprised to see that he has given a name to every loose stone of the road. He is unrivalled as an artist. He rightly remarks in the preface to Tess that a novelist should be an impressionist and not a pleader. A novel should be an impression not an argument. Every novelist is a story teller at bottom – and therefore the novel must remain a story and should not become a thesis.

9.3 Emily Brontë: Her Age, Life, and Education

Emily Brontë (1818-1848) was a renowned English novelist and poet, best remembered for her only novel, Wuthering Heights. Born on July 30, 1818, in Thornton, West Yorkshire, she was the fifth of six children of Patrick Brontë and Maria Branwell. Her siblings included two older sisters, Charlotte and Anne, who were also accomplished writers, and a brother, Branwell. Collectively, the Brontë sisters are considered among the most important literary figures of the 19th century.

Growing up in the remote village of Haworth, Emily and her siblings were home-schooled by their father, a clergyman, and spent much of their time creating imaginative worlds, writing stories, and composing poetry. Their early literary pursuits were mostly collaborative, including a series of stories and poems set in the imaginary world of Gondal, which Emily and Anne created together.

As an adult, Emily briefly attended a ladies' college but returned home due to her struggles with homesickness. She later worked as a teacher and a governess but found these occupations unsuitable. Ultimately, Emily focused her energies on writing and living a reclusive life at the Haworth Parsonage.

In 1846, Emily, Charlotte, and Anne published a collection of poetry under the pseudonyms Ellis, Currer, and Acton Bell, respectively, in order to conceal their gender. The book, Poems by Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell, received little attention but solidified the sisters' determination to continue writing.

Emily's masterpiece, Wuthering Heights, was published in 1847. The novel, which remains one of the most iconic works of English literature, is a dark and complex tale of love, revenge, and the human condition. It is set on the Yorkshire moors and tells the story of Heathcliff, an orphan adopted by the Earnshaw family, and his tumultuous relationship with his adoptive sister, Catherine. The novel's innovative narrative structure, vivid characters, and emotional intensity have contributed to its enduring appeal and influence on subsequent literature.

Sadly, Emily Brontë's life was cut short when she succumbed to tuberculosis on December 19, 1848, at the age of 30. Despite her brief career, her contributions to literature, particularly through Wuthering Heights, have left a lasting impact, and she is celebrated as one of the most distinctive and influential voices in English literature.

9.3.1 Her Age

---

The period during which Emily Brontë lived and wrote was the early to mid-19th century, during the Victorian era. Queen Victoria's reign began in 1837 and continued until her death in 1901. The Victorian era was marked by significant social, political, and economic changes, as well as the rapid expansion of the British Empire. It was a time of great innovation and progress in science, industry, and technology, as well as a time of great poverty and social unrest.

Literature played a significant role during this time, with novels becoming increasingly popular as a form of entertainment and social critique. Victorian literature was marked by a focus on realism, social issues, and moral dilemmas, as well as a fascination with the Gothic and the supernatural.

Emily Brontë's Wuthering Heights was published in 1847 under the pseudonym Ellis Bell. It was initially met with mixed reviews, as its dark themes and unconventional narrative structure were challenging for some readers. However, over time, Wuthering Heights gained recognition as a ground-breaking work of literature that delved deeply into themes of love, revenge, social class, and the human condition.

9.3.2 Her Life

---

Emily Brontë (1818-1848) was a British author and poet, best known for her only novel, Wuthering Heights. Born in Thornton, West Yorkshire, she was the third of six children born to Patrick Brontë and Maria Branwell. Her siblings were Charlotte, Branwell, Anne, Maria, and Elizabeth.

In 1820, the Brontë family moved to Haworth, where Emily's father was appointed perpetual curate. Tragically, Emily's mother died of cancer in 1821, leaving the children in the care of their maternal aunt, Elizabeth Branwell. In 1824, Emily and her sisters Charlotte, Maria, and Elizabeth were sent to the Clergy Daughters' School at Cowan Bridge, where the poor conditions and harsh treatment likely influenced the portrayal of Lowood School in Charlotte's novel, Jane Eyre. The two older sisters, Maria and Elizabeth, contracted tuberculosis at the school and subsequently died, which led to the removal of the remaining Brontë sisters from the school.

After this tragedy, Emily was educated at home in Haworth, where she developed a love for the Yorkshire moors that would later feature prominently in Wuthering Heights. The Brontë children spent much of their free time creating vivid imaginary worlds, which they documented in notebooks and miniature books. Emily and Anne created the world of Gondal, while Charlotte and Branwell focused on the world of Angria.

As an adult, Emily briefly worked as a teacher at Law Hill School in Halifax in 1838, but she left the position after just a few months, likely due to homesickness and her dislike of the restrictive school environment. Emily and her sisters then made several attempts to establish a school at their home, but they were ultimately unsuccessful.

Emily was a private and reclusive person, spending most of her time at home with her family. She is thought to have had few close friends outside her siblings. She began writing poetry in her late teens, and in 1846, she published a collection of poems with her sisters Charlotte and Anne, using the pen names Ellis, Currer, and Acton Bell to conceal their genders. And, in 1847, Emily published Wuthering Heights under the pen name Ellis Bell.

Emily Brontë died of tuberculosis on December 19, 1848, at the age of 30, just a year after the publication of her novel. She is buried in the family vault at St. Michael and All Angels' Church in Haworth.

9.3.3 Her Education

---

Emily Brontë's education was primarily provided at home by her father, Patrick Brontë, a clergyman and poet. He encouraged all of his children to read widely and provided them with an extensive range of books. The Brontë siblings had access to literary works, religious texts, historical books, and periodicals, all of which contributed to their education and creative development.

In 1824, Emily, along with her sisters Charlotte, Maria, and Elizabeth, attended the Clergy Daughters' School at Cowan Bridge in Lancashire. The school was known for its harsh conditions and strict disciplinary measures. Emily's stay at the school was short-lived, however, as her older sisters Maria and Elizabeth fell ill and tragically died from tuberculosis. Their father removed Emily and Charlotte from the school in 1825, and they returned home to Haworth Parsonage.

After this experience, the remaining Brontë siblings were educated at home, with their father continuing to provide guidance and support. The children developed their writing skills by creating stories and poems together, inventing imaginary worlds such as Angria and Gondal.

Although Emily's formal education was limited, her upbringing at home with access to a variety of literary works, combined with her imaginative and creative nature, led her to become one of the most influential authors of her time.

Despite her literary genius, Emily Brontë remains an enigmatic figure, shrouded in mystery due to her reclusive nature and preference for solitude. A fiercely private individual, she eschewed the limelight and social conventions, focusing instead on her passion for writing and her love of the natural world. ### 9.4.1 Emily Brontë as a Novelist

---

Emily Brontë, as a novelist, distinguishes herself from her contemporaries through her unique approach to storytelling, her exploration of dark and passionate themes, and her defiance of societal norms. While her novel Wuthering Heights shares certain characteristics with the works of other 19th-century writers, such as an interest in social issues and a focus on character development, Brontë's work stands apart in several key ways.

1. Narrative structure: Unlike the more straightforward narratives employed by many of her contemporaries, Emily Brontë crafted a complex and layered narrative structure in Wuthering Heights. The story is told through multiple narrators — Mr. Lockwood and Nelly Dean — who relay the events from different perspectives and timeframes. This narrative technique adds depth and intrigue to the story, inviting readers to piece together the puzzle of the characters' lives.

2. Gothic atmosphere: While Gothic literature was popular during the 19th century, Emily Brontë's work delves even deeper into the dark and haunting aspects of the genre. The desolate and wild Yorkshire moors, the brooding and enigmatic character of Heathcliff, and the intense emotions that permeate the novel create a chilling atmosphere that sets Wuthering Heights apart from other contemporary novels.

3. Themes and characters: Emily Brontë's exploration of themes such as love, obsession, vengeance, and the destructive nature of social class was groundbreaking for her time. Her characters are deeply flawed and driven by powerful emotions, making them relatable and intriguing to readers. In contrast, many contemporary novels focused on the moral improvement of characters and the triumph of virtue over vice.

4. Defiance of conventions: Brontë's work challenged the societal norms and expectations of the time, particularly with regard to gender roles and the depiction of female characters. While many contemporary novels featured submissive and demure female protagonists, Brontë's Catherine Earnshaw is a strong-willed and passionate character who defies expectations. This defiance of conventions made Emily Brontë's work both controversial and ground-breaking.

Emily Brontë's unique approach to storytelling, her exploration of dark and passionate themes, and her defiance of societal norms set her apart from her contemporaries. Despite having written only one novel, Brontë's work continues to be celebrated as a classic of English literature, illustrating the profound impact of her distinct voice and vision on the literary world.

9.4.2 Emily Brontë and Her Sisters

The Brontë sisters, Emily, Charlotte, and Anne, each carved their own distinctive paths in the literary world, making significant contributions to English literature with their unique talents and perspectives. While all three shared a profound understanding of human emotions and a gift for storytelling, their works differed in terms of style, themes, and focus, creating a rich and diverse Brontë legacy.

Emily Brontë, as previously mentioned, is best known for her singular novel, Wuthering Heights. Charlotte Brontë, the eldest of the sisters, is most famous for her novel Jane Eyre, published in 1847 under the pseudonym Currer Bell. This coming-of-age story follows the life of its titular character, Jane, as she navigates the complexities of love, morality, and social expectations. Unlike Emily's Wuthering Heights, Charlotte's work is more grounded in realism, focusing on the protagonist's inner growth and resilience. Jane Eyre stands out for its exploration of themes such as gender roles, social class, and the significance of individuality.

Anne Brontë, the youngest of the three, is known for her novels Agnes Grey (1847) and The Tenant of Wildfell Hall (1848), published under the pseudonym Acton Bell. Anne's works often dealt with the harsh realities faced by women, critiquing the societal norms and expectations that confined them. Her writing is characterized by a moral clarity and a call for social reform, diverging from the more introspective nature of Emily's work and the romantic elements of Charlotte's.

The Brontë sisters, despite their shared upbringing and literary influences, brought their unique voices and perspectives to their novels. Emily's dark and passionate Wuthering Heights contrasts with Charlotte's character-driven and introspective Jane Eyre, while Anne's socially critical works focus on the plight of women in a patriarchal society. Each sister's distinctive approach to storytelling and exploration of human emotions has left an indelible mark on the landscape of English literature, ensuring their lasting legacy as three of the most celebrated novelists of the 19th century.

9.4.3 Emily Brontë and Charles Dickens

Emily Brontë and Charles Dickens, both luminaries of the 19th-century literary world, each left an indelible mark on literature. Although they emerged from the same era, their styles, themes, and literary contributions are distinctly different, showcasing the richness and diversity of Victorian literature.

Emily Brontë, best known for her singular novel, Wuthering Heights, delved into the depths of human passion, exploring themes of love, obsession, and revenge. Brontë's unique storytelling approach intertwines multiple narrators and nonlinear timelines, creating a haunting and complex tapestry of emotions and relationships.

In contrast, Charles Dickens, a prolific author with numerous novels and short stories to his name, is celebrated for his vivid characterizations and biting social commentary. Dickens painted a detailed portrait of Victorian England, highlighting the ills of the Industrial Revolution, class disparities, and social injustices. Works such as Oliver Twist, A Tale of Two Cities, and Great Expectations demonstrate his ability to weave intricate plots and create memorable characters, while also addressing pressing societal issues.

While Brontë's writing leans towards introspective exploration of the human psyche, Dickens' work is more outward-looking, focusing on the struggles and triumphs of everyday life in Victorian society. Brontë's prose, often imbued with a poetic quality, is more concerned with the emotional and psychological aspects of her characters. On the other hand, Dickens' writing is characterized by a sharp wit, rich description, and a strong sense of realism.

Emily Brontë and Charles Dickens, though contemporaries, offer contrasting literary styles and thematic concerns. Brontë's work is a deeply emotional and introspective examination of human relationships, while Dickens' novels provide incisive social commentary and memorable character studies. Both authors have left an enduring legacy, shaping the course of English literature and offering readers the opportunity to experience the vast spectrum of human experience.

9.4.4 Elaine Showalter's Views on Emily Brontë

Elaine Showalter, a prominent American literary critic and feminist scholar, has made significant contributions to the study of women writers, including Emily Brontë. Showalter's ground-breaking book, A Literature of Their Own: British Women Novelists from Brontë to Lessing (1977), provides a comprehensive analysis of the development of women's writing in Britain from the Victorian period to the 20th century.

In her work, Showalter emphasizes the importance of understanding female literary tradition and the social context that influenced women's writing. She divides the evolution of women's writing into three phases: the Feminine Phase (1840-1880), the Feminist Phase (1880-1920), and the Female Phase (1920 onwards). According to Showalter, Emily Brontë belongs to the Feminine phase, characterized by women writers imitating the dominant male literary tradition and internalizing the prevailing patriarchal values.

Showalter acknowledges Emily Brontë's unique position as a female writer in the 19th century, recognizing the challenges she faced as a woman in a male-dominated literary world. In Wuthering Heights, Brontë explores themes of gender, power, and social constraints, transcending the traditional expectations of female writers during her time. Showalter argues that Brontë's bold and innovative approach to storytelling, including the exploration of dark and violent emotions, sets her apart from her contemporaries.

Moreover, Showalter emphasizes that Emily Brontë's reclusive lifestyle and the fact that she wrote under a male pseudonym reveal the complexities faced by women writers in the Victorian era. The mystique surrounding Brontë's life and her singular work has fascinated critics like Showalter, who continue to analyse her contributions to the development of female literary tradition.

Elaine Showalter's views on Emily Brontë focus on understanding her within the context of female literary tradition, acknowledging the challenges she faced as a woman writer in the 19th century, and recognizing the innovative and ground-breaking qualities of her work in Wuthering Heights.

9.5 Emily Brontë's Philosophy of Life

Emily Brontë had a unique philosophy of life that was deeply influenced by her personal experiences, the natural world, and her imagination. While it is difficult to pinpoint a single, coherent philosophy in her work, several key themes can be identified in her writing and her life:

The power of nature: Emily Brontë was deeply influenced by the rugged beauty of the Yorkshire moors, where she spent most of her life. Nature served as a source of inspiration and solace for her, and she often used it as a backdrop in her writing. In her poetry and prose, the natural world is portrayed as a powerful, untamed force that can mirror human emotions and passions.

The duality of existence: Brontë's work often explores the dichotomy between good and evil, love and hate, and suffering and happiness. Wuthering Heights, for example, is a story of intense and destructive passions that coexist alongside deep love and devotion. Brontë suggests that these dualities are inherent in human nature and that we must learn to navigate them to find meaning and purpose in life.

The importance of individualism: Emily Brontë was a fiercely independent woman who valued her own thoughts and feelings above societal norms and expectations. In her work, she emphasizes the importance of embracing one's true self, even when it goes against societal conventions. This can be seen in characters like Catherine Earnshaw and Heathcliff, who defy social norms in pursuit of their desires.

The inevitability of suffering: Brontë's life was marked by personal tragedy and loss, which is reflected in her writing. She believed that suffering was an inevitable part of the human experience and that it was necessary for growth and self-discovery. Her characters often endure great hardships, but these trials ultimately serve to deepen their understanding of themselves and the world around them.

The transcendence of love: One of the central themes in Wuthering Heights is the power of love to transcend boundaries and overcome obstacles. The novel suggests that true love, while often accompanied by suffering, can create a powerful connection between individuals that transcends time, space, and even death.

Emily Brontë's philosophy of life is characterized by a deep appreciation for the natural world, an exploration of the dualities inherent in human nature, a celebration of individualism, an acceptance of suffering as a part of existence, and a belief in the transcendent power of love.

10.3 The Brief Outline of Wuthering Heights.

Wuthering Heights is a novel by Emily Brontë, published in 1847. The novel is set in the early 19th century in the moors of Yorkshire, England and follows the lives of two families, the Earnshaws and the Lintons. The novel is a complex tale of love, revenge, and the destructive power of obsession.

The novel begins with the introduction of Mr. Lockwood, a tenant at Thrushcross Grange who has rented Wuthering Heights, a nearby farmhouse, from the surly and inhospitable Heathcliff. Lockwood becomes fascinated by the story of Heathcliff and the inhabitants of Wuthering Heights and eventually learns the tragic history of the Earnshaws and the Lintons.

The story begins with the arrival of Mr. Earnshaw's adopted son, Heathcliff, at Wuthering Heights. Heathcliff is a dark-skinned gypsy boy and is initially mistreated by Mr. Earnshaw's son, Hindley, but he becomes very close to Earnshaw's daughter, Catherine. Catherine and Heathcliff form a deep and intense bond, but their relationship is complicated by their different social statuses and Catherine's growing interest in Edgar Linton, a wealthy neighbour.

Catherine eventually marries Linton, which devastates Heathcliff and sets off a chain of events that drives the rest of the novel. Heathcliff becomes obsessed with revenge and begins to take it out on the Lintons and the Earnshaws. He becomes cruel and ruthless and eventually takes control of Wuthering Heights and Thrushcross Grange.

Throughout the novel, the themes of love, hate, revenge, and the destructive power of obsession are explored in depth. The novel also touches on issues of social class and the role of women in society. Brontë's use of language and imagery is powerful and poetic, and the characters are complex and well-drawn.

One of the most striking aspects of the novel is the character of Heathcliff. He is a dark and brooding figure, filled with anger and hatred, yet he is also deeply passionate and capable of great love. His obsession with Catherine and his desire for revenge drive the plot of the novel and make him one of the most memorable characters in literature.

Catherine, too, is a complex character. She is headstrong and passionate, but also selfish and manipulative. Her love for Heathcliff is intense and consuming, but her desire for social status ultimately drives her to marry Edgar Linton. Her decision sets off a chain of events that she is unable to control and that ultimately leads to tragedy.

The other characters in the novel are also well-drawn and memorable. Hindley, Mr. Earnshaw's son, is consumed with jealousy and resentment toward Heathcliff and ultimately becomes a drunken and abusive figure. Edgar Linton is wealthy and refined, but also weak and unable to control his wife or protect his family from Heathcliff's wrath. Isabella Linton, Edgar's sister, becomes infatuated with Heathcliff and marries him, only to discover too late the dark and cruel nature of his obsession.

The novel is also notable for its setting on the Yorkshire moors. The landscape is harsh and unforgiving, and the characters are often at the mercy of the elements. The moors also serve as a metaphor for the wild and untamed emotions of the characters.

Ultimately, Wuthering Heights is a powerful and tragic novel that explores the depths of human emotion and the destructive power of obsession. Brontë's vivid language and imagery, along with her complex and memorable characters, make the novel a timeless masterpiece of English literature.

10.4.1 Plot Structure

---

Emily Brontë's Wuthering Heights is a classic example of Gothic fiction that has captivated readers for centuries. The novel's intricate and non-linear plot structure is one of the primary reasons for its enduring appeal.

Framing Narrative and Unreliable Narrators:

Wuthering Heights is unique in its use of a frame narrative, where the story is relayed through the perspective of two unreliable narrators, Mr. Lockwood and Nelly Dean. This narrative technique adds depth and complexity to the story, as the reader is compelled to question the accuracy of the narrators' accounts and piece together the true nature of events. This element of unreliability generates a sense of mystery and intrigue, encouraging the reader to actively engage with the text.

Dual Timeframe:

The novel is set in two distinct time periods, creating a sense of temporal depth and allowing for a rich exploration of generational conflicts and legacies. The narrative shifts between the late 18th century, focusing on the tumultuous relationship between Heathcliff and Catherine Earnshaw, and the early 19th century, which centres on the second generation of characters. This dual timeframe adds a layer of complexity to the novel and intensifies the impact of the characters' actions on future generations.

Parallelism and Doubling:

Wuthering Heights employs the technique of parallelism and doubling, as the characters and events of the first generation are mirrored by those of the second. This creates a sense of symmetry and cyclical pattern, underlining the themes of revenge, social class, and the destructive power of love. The novel's intricate structure serves to reinforce these themes and emphasizes the consequences of the characters' choices on the lives of their descendants.

Contrasting Settings:

The contrasting settings of Wuthering Heights and Thrushcross Grange play a crucial role in the novel's plot structure. These two estates represent opposing values and lifestyles, with Wuthering Heights symbolizing the wild, untamed moors, and Thrushcross Grange representing the gentler, more refined aspects of society. The characters' movement between these two locations serves as a reflection of their internal struggles and emotional states, furthering the novel's exploration of the human condition.

Gothic Elements and Supernatural Intrusions:

The Gothic elements of Wuthering Heights, such as the haunted house, dark and brooding atmosphere, and supernatural occurrences, contribute to the novel's complex plot structure. The plot structure of Emily Brontë's Wuthering Heights is an intricate and masterful blend of narrative techniques, timeframes, and thematic parallels that serve to heighten the novel's emotional intensity and thematic depth. The novel's non-linear structure, unreliable narrators, and Gothic atmosphere create a sense of mystery and intrigue that has captivated readers for generations, solidifying Wuthering Heights as a cornerstone of English literature.

10.4.2 Complexity of Characterisation

---

Emily Brontë's Wuthering Heights is an iconic work of English literature that has captivated readers since its publication in 1847. One of the novel's most compelling aspects is its intricate characterisation, which defies traditional classification and introduces a rich cast of characters that continue to haunt our collective imagination. In this section, we will explore the ways in which Brontë crafts her characters, focusing on the novel's two most memorable figures: Heathcliff and Catherine Earnshaw.

The Ambiguity of Characters:

Brontë's characters are complex and layered, often evoking both sympathy and repulsion. Heathcliff, for instance, is at once a victim of cruel circumstances and a perpetrator of violence and vengeance. This duality creates an enigmatic figure who cannot be easily categorised as either a hero or a villain. Similarly, Catherine is a strong-willed, passionate character who possesses a self-destructive nature. Her capriciousness and inability to reconcile her love for Heathcliff with her desire for social advancement leads to her own downfall. These multifaceted characters challenge the reader's expectations and invite deeper exploration.

The Impact of Environment:

The harsh and unforgiving landscape of the Yorkshire moors shapes the characters of Wuthering Heights, and their behaviours are a reflection of their surroundings. The novel's titular setting, Wuthering Heights, is described as a dark and stormy place that breeds a sense of isolation and even hostility. This atmosphere is mirrored in the personalities of its inhabitants, particularly Heathcliff, who becomes increasingly cruel and vengeful as the story unfolds. In contrast, Thrushcross Grange represents a more refined and cultured environment, which contributes to the development of characters like Edgar Linton, who is more genteel and restrained.

The Role of Social Class and Gender:

Brontë's portrayal of social class and gender dynamics is another crucial aspect of her characterisation. The novel explores the consequences of social hierarchy on the characters' lives, as well as the limitations imposed on them by their gender. Catherine's struggle to reconcile her love for Heathcliff with her ambition for a higher social status exemplifies the impact of social constraints. Similarly, Heathcliff's journey from a mistreated orphan to a wealthy landowner highlights the inherent injustices within the Victorian social order.

Relationships As a Means of Character Development:

The relationships between the characters in Wuthering Heights play a significant role in their development. The tempestuous love between Heathcliff and Catherine drives much of the novel's conflict, and their destructive passion is a central theme of the story. Additionally, the relationships between the various members of the Earnshaw and Linton families provide insights into their individual character traits and motivations.

Emily Brontë's Wuthering Heights presents a masterful study in characterisation. Through her use of ambiguity, the influence of the environment, the exploration of social class and gender dynamics, and the power of relationships, Brontë crafts a cast of characters that are as complex and enduring as the novel itself.

10.4.3 Narrative Technique

---

Emily Brontë's 1847 novel, Wuthering Heights, has long been regarded as a classic of English literature. The narrative technique employed by Brontë plays a significant role in shaping the novel's distinctive atmosphere, while also contributing to the story's complexity and depth. Here, we will examine the most salient aspects of Brontë's narrative technique in Wuthering Heights, including the use of a frame narrative, the choice of multiple narrators, and the novel's non-linear structure.

Frame Narrative:

Wuthering Heights is structured as a frame narrative, with the outer frame being the story of Mr. Lockwood, a tenant at Thrushcross Grange, who becomes intrigued by his enigmatic landlord, Heathcliff, and the dark history of Wuthering Heights (place). The inner story is primarily told through the housekeeper, Nelly Dean, with occasional interjections from other characters. This narrative technique serves to create a sense of distance between the reader and the events of the story, as well as adding an air of mystery and suspense to the novel.

Multiple Narrators:

Brontë's decision to use multiple narrators in Wuthering Heights enhances the story's complexity and richness. By providing different perspectives on the events and characters, the novel offers the reader an opportunity to form their own opinions and draw their own conclusions. Nelly Dean serves as the primary narrator, but her account is occasionally supplemented by other characters, such as Heathcliff, Isabella, and Catherine. This technique allows Brontë to explore the subjectivity of human experience and the limitations of individual perspectives.

Non-linear Structure:

The narrative of Wuthering Heights is non-linear, with events unfolding in a disjointed manner, as Nelly's recollections and Lockwood's experiences intertwine. This structure enables Brontë to create a sense of tension and suspense, as readers must piece together the story from the fragments provided. Additionally, the non-linear structure reflects the novel's themes of cyclical violence and generational trauma, as the past continually resurfaces to shape the present.

Unreliable Narration:

Brontë's choice to use first-person narration in Wuthering Heights means that the story is subject to the biases and limitations of the individual narrators. As a result, the novel features a degree of unreliable narration, particularly from Nelly Dean, who is intimately involved in the events she recounts. This device allows Brontë to explore the complexities of human emotion and the fallibility of memory, while also encouraging the reader to engage critically with the narrative and question the veracity of the accounts provided.

In conclusion, the narrative technique employed by Emily Brontë in Wuthering Heights is a key element of the novel's enduring appeal. The use of a frame narrative, multiple narrators, a non-linear structure, and unreliable narration all contribute to the novel's rich and complex atmosphere. By challenging conventional narrative structures and offering multiple perspectives on the story's events, Brontë encourages readers to question the nature of truth and the reliability of human memory, making Wuthering Heights a captivating and thought-provoking literary work. Emily Brontë's narrative technique in her novel Wuthering Heights is complex, yet it exhibits her skill, perfection, and novelty. Even fastidious critics have praised her narrative technique.

10.4.4 Themes and Motifs

Wuthering Heights is rich with themes and motifs, many of which are interconnected, creating a complex and layered narrative. Some of the most prominent themes and motifs in Wuthering Heights include:

Love and obsession: The novel explores the destructive and all-consuming nature of love, particularly through the tumultuous relationship between Heathcliff and Catherine Earnshaw. Their love is obsessive, passionate, and ultimately destructive, as it consumes their lives and the lives of those around them.

Nature versus civilization: Wuthering Heights contrasts the wild, untamed nature of the Yorkshire moors with the refined and civilized world of Thrushcross Grange. This motif is also mirrored in the characters, with Heathcliff representing the raw, untamed forces of nature and Edgar Linton symbolizing the genteel, civilized world.

Social class and inheritance: The novel scrutinizes the rigid class structure of 19th-century England and the role that inheritance plays in determining a person's worth and prospects. Heathcliff, an orphan with no social standing, rises to wealth and power through cunning and ruthlessness, ultimately disrupting the social order.

Revenge and cycles of violence: One of the most striking themes in the novel is the cycle of violence and revenge that plagues the characters. Heathcliff's quest for vengeance against those who have wronged him perpetuates a cycle of violence that affects everyone around him, and demonstrates the destructive nature of seeking revenge.

The supernatural and the Gothic: Wuthering Heights is often considered a Gothic novel due to its use of supernatural elements and dark, atmospheric setting. Ghosts, omens, and dreams all play a role in the narrative, contributing to the sense of mystery and foreboding that permeates the story.

Doubling and contrasts: The novel is filled with doubles and contrasts, both in its characters and settings. For instance, Heathcliff and Catherine are contrasted with Edgar and Isabella Linton, while Wuthering Heights and Thrushcross Grange serve as opposing settings. These dualities serve to illuminate the various themes and motifs present in the novel.

The power of the past: The past is a powerful force in Wuthering Heights, influencing the present and shaping the future of the characters. The novel is structured as a series of interconnected flashbacks, underscoring the importance of the past and the way it haunts the characters.

Wuthering Heights is a novel that delves into themes of love, obsession, nature, civilization, social class, revenge, the supernatural, doubling, and the power of the past. ## 10.5 Critical Reception

Wuthering Heights, published in 1847, is the only novel by Emily Brontë. It has garnered a complex and varied critical reception over the years. Initially, the novel was met with mixed reviews, primarily due to its controversial themes and dark, Gothic tone. Many critics at the time were shocked by the violence, passion, and unconventional characters in the story, and some even questioned the morality of the novel.

Over time, however, Wuthering Heights has come to be regarded as a classic of English literature. As the Victorian era's strict moral codes began to loosen, later generations of critics started to appreciate the novel's depth, emotional intensity, and exploration of human nature. Critics began to recognize the innovative narrative structure and the vivid, complex characters, such as the iconic Heathcliff and Catherine Earnshaw.

Today, Wuthering Heights is celebrated as a seminal work in the Gothic genre and a profound exploration of love, obsession, and the destructive power of social class. Scholars and readers continue to analyse the novel's themes and its place in the literary canon. It is frequently studied in literature courses and continues to inspire adaptations, such as movies, TV series, and stage productions. While the novel remains polarizing, with some readers still finding the characters and themes challenging or unlikable, Wuthering Heights has undeniably left a lasting impact on the literary world and continues to be a beloved and influential work.

The novel's dark themes, violence, and passionate characters were considered shocking to Victorian readers. Its unconventional narrative structure also drew both praise and criticism.

Feminist criticism: Many feminist critics view Wuthering Heights as an important work of female authorship that challenges traditional gender roles and expectations. They argue that Brontë created strong, independent female characters in Catherine Earnshaw and Catherine Linton, who defy societal norms and assert their own desires.

Psychoanalytic criticism: Psychoanalytic critics often analyse the novel's characters and relationships through the lens of psychological theories, such as Freudian concepts of the id, ego, and superego. They explore the characters' motivations, desires, and conflicts, as well as themes of love, hate, and the subconscious.

Gothic and Romantic elements: Critics have long recognized Wuthering Heights as a significant work within both the Gothic and Romantic literary traditions. They examine the novel's dark, atmospheric setting, supernatural elements, and exploration of emotional extremes, as well as its portrayal of passionate, often destructive love.

Postcolonial and race criticism: More recent critical perspectives have addressed the novel's treatment of race and colonialism, particularly through the character of Heathcliff, whose origins are ambiguous and who is often described as an outsider. Critics may explore the power dynamics between characters and the ways in which racial and class prejudices are depicted.

Wuthering Heights has been subject to a wide variety of critical interpretations, with some finding it a groundbreaking and influential work, while others are more critical of its dark themes and unconventional structure. Its continued popularity and status as a literary classic suggest that the novel's impact and significance will endure.

11.2 A Short Note on Modern Novels

The Modern English novel of the first half of the 20th century was marked by several significant authors, themes, and stylistic innovations. Here are some key points to consider when discussing this period:

Notable authors: Some of the most influential authors during this time include Virginia Woolf, James Joyce, D.H. Lawrence, George Orwell, and Aldous Huxley. These writers produced works that have had a lasting impact on the development of the novel.

Stream of consciousness: One of the most significant innovations during this period was the use of the stream of consciousness technique, which attempted to capture the inner workings of a character's mind. This style can be seen in works such as Virginia Woolf's Mrs. Dalloway and James Joyce's Ulysses.

Social issues: The novels of this era often engaged with contemporary social issues, such as gender and class, providing commentary and criticism. D.H. Lawrence's Lady Chatterley's Lover, for example, explores the relationship between sexuality and class, while George Orwell's 1984 critiques totalitarianism and surveillance.

Experimentation: Many novels from this period pushed the boundaries of narrative structure and form, often experimenting with non-linear storytelling, fragmented narratives, and unconventional prose styles. Finnegans Wake by James Joyce is a prime example of this, with its unconventional language and dense, allusive style.

Influence of war: The two World Wars had a significant impact on literature during this period, as authors grappled with the consequences and aftermath of the conflicts. Works such as Ernest Hemingway's A Farewell to Arms and Ford Madox Ford's Parade's End directly address the experiences of war and its effects on individuals and society.

Satire and dystopia: The early 20th-century novel often employed satire and dystopian elements to critique societal norms, politics, and ideologies. Examples include Aldous Huxley's Brave New World and George Orwell's Animal Farm.

The Modern English novel of the first half of the 20th century was marked by innovation, experimentation, and a focus on social issues. The works produced during this time continue to be influential and relevant, shaping the course of English literature and offering valuable insights into the era in which they were written.

In the first half of the 20th century, several significant Modern English novels emerged, pushing the boundaries of literature and exploring new themes and styles. Here is an introduction to five major novels from this era, along with brief summaries:

Ulysses (1922) by James Joyce

Set in Dublin, Ireland, on June 16, 1904, "Ulysses" follows the lives of Leopold Bloom, his wife Molly, and Stephen Dedalus over the course of a single day. The novel is famous for its stream-of-consciousness style and its exploration of various literary techniques. Each chapter is inspired by an episode in Homer's "Odyssey," adding a layer of mythological significance to the characters' everyday experiences.

"Mrs. Dalloway" (1925) by Virginia Woolf

Another novel employing stream-of-consciousness, "Mrs. Dalloway" revolves around Clarissa Dalloway, an upper-class Englishwoman, as she prepares for a party. Taking place over a single day in London, the novel weaves together the thoughts and experiences of various characters, including war veteran Septimus Warren Smith. Woolf delves deeply into her characters' inner lives and highlights the lasting effects of World War I on English society.

"The Great Gatsby" (1925) by F. Scott Fitzgerald

Set in the Roaring Twenties, "The Great Gatsby" explores the decadence and disillusionment of the American Dream. The story follows the mysterious millionaire Jay Gatsby, who is desperately in love with the married Daisy Buchanan. The novel is narrated by Nick Carraway, a young man who moves to Long Island and becomes Gatsby's neighbour. "The Great Gatsby" critiques the superficiality and materialism of the era, while also exploring themes of love, betrayal, and the pursuit of wealth.

"To the Lighthouse" (1927) by Virginia Woolf

A landmark in modernist literature, "To the Lighthouse" employs a stream-of-consciousness narrative to explore the lives and thoughts of the Ramsay family and their guests over a ten-year period. Set on the Isle of Skye, the novel focuses on the Ramsay's attempts to visit a nearby lighthouse, which serves as a symbol of human connection and the passage of time. The novel delves into themes of gender, art, and the nature of perception.

"Brave New World" (1932) by Aldous Huxley

This dystopian novel is set in a futuristic World State, where society is organized around the principles of mass production, conformity, and consumerism. The population is conditioned from birth to accept their roles in society, with no room for individuality or emotional connection. The story follows several characters, including the "Savage" John, who is raised outside of the World State and ultimately confronts its dehumanizing nature. "Brave New World" serves as a cautionary tale about the potential dangers of technological progress and the suppression of individual freedom.

11.4.1 His Age

The socio-political and historical period during which he lived and worked is characterized primarily by the late Victorian era, the Edwardian era, and the aftermath of World War I, which influenced the Modernist movement.

Late Victorian Era (1885-1901): Lawrence was born during the last years of Queen Victoria's reign. This period was marked by a strong focus on morality, propriety, and social class distinctions. The Industrial Revolution had changed the landscape of England, leading to a rise in the urban working class and social inequality. This context appears in Lawrence's work, as he often explored themes of class struggle and critiqued the strict morality of the time.

Edwardian Era (1901-1910): The Edwardian era, marked by the reign of King Edward VII, was a time of relative stability and wealth. During this period, a more relaxed social atmosphere emerged, and the British Empire reached its peak. However, social inequality and class distinctions remained significant issues.

Lawrence's early works were published during this period, reflecting the societal shifts and questioning the established order.

World War I (1914-1918) and the Interwar Period: World War I drastically changed the political and social landscape of Europe. The war's devastation led to a disillusionment with traditional values, giving rise to the Modernist movement in literature and art. Lawrence's work during and after the war, including his famous novel Lady Chatterley's Lover, reflected this disillusionment and challenged the conventional norms of sexuality and relationships. Additionally, his work explored themes of industrialization, individualism, and the search for authenticity in a rapidly changing world.

D.H. Lawrence's work was shaped by the socio-political and historical context of the late Victorian era, Edwardian era, and the aftermath of World War I. His exploration of class struggle, sexuality, and the individual's place in society resonated with readers during these periods and continues to be influential today.

11.4.2 His Life

David Herbert Lawrence, more commonly known as D. H. Lawrence, was an English writer, poet, and playwright. He was born on September 11, 1885, in Eastwood, Nottinghamshire, England, and died on March 2, 1930, in Vence, France. Lawrence was a prominent literary figure of the early 20th century, and his works were often controversial for their explicit portrayal of human sexuality and relationships.

Lawrence was born into a working-class family. His father, Arthur John Lawrence, was a coal miner, while his mother, Lydia Beardsall Lawrence, was a former schoolteacher. His parents' contrasting backgrounds and volatile relationship had a significant impact on Lawrence's life and later writings. He had three siblings: Ada, George, and Emily.

Lawrence attended Beauvale Board School and later, the Nottingham High School, where he won a scholarship. He went on to work as a student-teacher at the British School in Eastwood before attending University College, Nottingham. After completing his studies, he worked as a teacher in Croydon, South London.

In 1912, Lawrence eloped with Frieda Weekley (née von Richthofen), a married woman with three children. Frieda was the wife of his former university professor, Ernest Weekley. Their relationship was tumultuous, characterized by passionate love and intense quarrels. They married in 1914 after Frieda's divorce was finalized. Although they did not have children, their relationship was a significant source of inspiration for Lawrence's work.

Lawrence and Frieda led a nomadic life, traveling extensively throughout Europe, Asia, Australia, and the Americas. They sought to escape the stifling conformity and restrictions of British society. This search for freedom and a more fulfilling way of life would become a recurring theme in Lawrence's work.

His travels included stays in Italy, Germany, Sri Lanka (then called Ceylon), Australia, New Mexico, and Mexico. During World War I, Lawrence and Frieda were accused of being German spies, leading to a brief period of surveillance by the British government. Lawrence's controversial writings, particularly his novel Lady Chatterley's Lover, which was banned in many countries for its explicit content, contributed to his sense of exile from British society.

Lawrence's health deteriorated in the late 1920s, and he was diagnosed with tuberculosis. He died on March 2, 1930, in Vence, France, at the age of 44. After his death, his reputation as a significant literary figure continued to grow, and his work has since become recognized as a vital part of the modernist literary movement.

11.4.3 His Education

---

Lawrence's educational background was as follows:

Beauvale Board School: Lawrence attended the Beauvale Board School in Eastwood, where he received his early education.

High Pavement Grammar School: In 1898, at the age of 13, Lawrence won a scholarship to attend the High Pavement Grammar School in Nottingham. During his time there, he was exposed to a more formal and rigorous education, which fostered his interest in literature and writing.

University College, Nottingham (now the University of Nottingham): After completing his secondary education, Lawrence earned a teaching certificate from University College, Nottingham, in 1908. While studying there, he continued to develop his literary skills, writing poetry and prose.

It is essential to note that Lawrence's education was not solely rooted in formal schooling. He was an avid reader and autodidact, learning from his experiences and the people he encountered throughout his life. His deep engagement with literature and philosophy, as well as his personal experiences, played a significant role in shaping his views and literary style.

His works have had a lasting impact on the trajectory of English literature, and his influence can be seen in the works of many writers who followed him. Here are some key aspects of Lawrence's contribution to modern English novels:

Exploration of human emotions and relationships: Lawrence was a pioneer in delving deeply into the psychological aspects of human relationships, particularly those of love and sexuality. By examining the complexities and emotional intricacies of interpersonal relationships, he helped redefine the way novels approached these themes. This emphasis on emotional and psychological depth can be seen in the works of later writers like Virginia Woolf and Graham Greene.

Focus on sexuality: Lawrence's frank exploration of sexuality in his novels was revolutionary for his time. He challenged conventional norms and societal expectations by openly discussing sexual desire, fulfilment, and repression. Lady Chatterley's Lover, for example, became notorious for its explicit content and was even banned in several countries. Lawrence's openness about sexuality paved the way for other writers, such as Henry Miller and Anais Nin, to further explore the topic in their works.

Rejection of industrialization and modern society: Lawrence was a critic of the industrialization and urbanization that were rapidly transforming England during his time. His novels often depicted the negative impact of industrial society on individuals and communities, with characters seeking a return to a more natural and harmonious existence. This theme can be found in later works by authors such as George Orwell and Aldous Huxley, who also critiqued the dehumanizing aspects of modern society.

The influence of psychoanalysis: Lawrence was interested in the emerging field of psychoanalysis, and its influence can be seen in his exploration of the unconscious mind and its impact on human behaviour. His focus on the inner lives of his characters and their psychological motivations helped pave the way for later writers to further explore these themes, such as James Joyce and Samuel Beckett.

Evocative use of language: Lawrence's writing is known for its poetic and vivid descriptions of both the natural world and human emotions. He used language to create a unique atmosphere in his novels, often emphasizing the sensory and emotional aspects of experience. This stylistic innovation had a lasting impact on English literature, influencing the works of writers like William Golding and Iris Murdoch.

D. H. Lawrence's contributions to modern English novels are vast and varied. Through his exploration of themes like human emotions, relationships, and sexuality, as well as his innovative use of language and critique of modern society, Lawrence has left an indelible mark on the landscape of English literature.

11.4.2 Major Works

D. H. Lawrence (1885-1930), a prominent British novelist, poet, and playwright, is known for his distinct writing style that often explored themes of nature, sexuality, and relationships. Many of his works contain autobiographical elements, reflecting his own life experiences and views. This introduction will discuss some of the key ways in which Lawrence's personal life influenced his novels, focusing on three major works: Sons and Lovers, The Rainbow, and Lady Chatterley's Lover.

Sons and Lovers* (1913): One of Lawrence's most famous novels, Sons and Lovers, is heavily inspired by his own life, particularly his upbringing and family dynamics. Set in a working-class mining community, the novel centres on the character Paul Morel, who, like Lawrence, is the son of a coal miner and a mother who yearns for a more refined life. The relationships between Paul, his parents, and his lovers parallel Lawrence's own experiences, as the author drew from his difficult relationship with his father, his strong bond with his mother, and his romantic involvements with various women.

The Rainbow* (1915): While The Rainbow is not as overtly autobiographical as Sons and Lovers, it still contains elements of Lawrence's life and beliefs. The novel follows three generations of the Brangwen family, and the rural setting of the story is similar to the Eastwood countryside where Lawrence grew up. Furthermore, the novel's exploration of the characters' relationships with nature and the importance of individuality aligns with Lawrence's own philosophies. Additionally, the novel's exploration of female sexuality and independence can be traced back to the influence of the women in his life, including his mother, Lydia Lawrence, and his wife, Frieda von Richthofen.

Lady Chatterley's Lover* (1928): Arguably one of Lawrence's most controversial works, Lady Chatterley's Lover explores themes of sexuality, class, and the search for personal fulfilment. The novel's protagonist, Lady Constance Chatterley, is a reflection of Lawrence's wife Frieda, who was known for her open attitudes towards sexuality and her dissatisfaction with societal norms. The novel also showcases Lawrence's personal beliefs about the importance of sexual fulfilment and emotional connection in relationships.

D. H. Lawrence's novels often contain autobiographical elements, as they are deeply influenced by his own life experiences, relationships, and beliefs. This connection between the author's life and his works provides readers with a unique insight into Lawrence's world, making his novels not only engaging stories but also windows into the mind of one of the 20th century's most influential writers.

11.4.3 Controversies on His Novels

---

D. H. Lawrence's novels have sparked numerous controversies throughout the years, primarily due to their frank depiction of sexuality, relationships, and critiques of societal norms. These controversies often led to censorship, bans, and public outrage during the early 20th century. Here are some of the most notable controversies surrounding Lawrence's novels:

Sons and Lovers* (1913): Although not as controversial as some of his later works, Sons and Lovers still faced criticism for its candid portrayal of relationships and sexuality. The novel explores the Oedipal complex between the protagonist, Paul Morel, and his mother, as well as his tumultuous relationships with various lovers. Some critics felt that Lawrence was promoting unhealthy relationships and immoral behaviour through his portrayal of these characters.

The Rainbow (1915): The Rainbow's depiction of female sexuality and independence, especially in the character of Ursula Brangwen, drew the ire of conservative critics. The novel was also criticized for its portrayal of same-sex relationships, which were considered taboo during the early 20th century. The book was banned in the United Kingdom shortly after its publication, with over a thousand copies seized and burned by the authorities.

Women in Love (1920): As the sequel to The Rainbow, Women in Love continued to explore themes of sexuality, relationships, and individuality. The novel's explicit content, including scenes of homoeroticism, led to its initial publication being delayed. Critics accused Lawrence of promoting immorality and obscenity through his detailed portrayal of sexual relationships.

Lady Chatterley's Lover (1928): Perhaps the most controversial of all Lawrence's novels, Lady Chatterley's Lover faced widespread censorship and bans due to its explicit sexual content and exploration of themes like infidelity and class divides. The book was initially published privately in Italy, but its distribution in other countries often faced legal challenges. In 1960, Penguin Books was taken to court in the United Kingdom under the Obscene Publications Act for publishing the novel. The highly publicized trial eventually resulted in a victory for Penguin, marking a significant shift in attitudes towards literary censorship in Britain.

The controversies surrounding D. H. Lawrence's novels primarily stem from their explicit exploration of sexuality and relationships, as well as their critiques of societal norms and conventions. Although these controversies initially led to censorship and bans, Lawrence's works have ultimately played a significant role in challenging and changing attitudes towards literature and the boundaries of artistic expression.

11.4.4 Critics's Views on His Novels

---

D. H. Lawrence's novels have been the subject of extensive literary criticism since their publication, with both praise and condemnation from various critics. Some prominent critics who have analysed and commented on Lawrence's works include:

F.R. Leavis: A highly influential British literary critic, Leavis held Lawrence in high esteem, considering him to be one of the most important modern English novelists. In his book, D. H. Lawrence: Novelist (1955), Leavis argued that Lawrence's works, especially Sons and Lovers, showcased a unique blend of psychological insight, artistic sensibility, and moral seriousness.

Kate Millett: A leading feminist critic, Millett criticized Lawrence's portrayal of women and gender relations in her ground-breaking work, Sexual Politics (1970). Millett argued that Lawrence's novels, particularly Women in Love and Lady Chatterley's Lover, perpetuated patriarchal ideologies and presented women as submissive to male authority.

T.S. Eliot: The renowned poet and critic T.S. Eliot admired Lawrence's literary talent but was critical of his moral and philosophical views. In his essay, 'D. H. Lawrence' (1931), Eliot criticized Lawrence's belief in the primacy of individualism and his emphasis on instinct over intellect.

Harold Bloom: A prolific American literary critic, Bloom included Lawrence in his book, The Western Canon (1994), which listed influential authors and their works. Although Bloom praised Lawrence's artistic abilities, he considered the author's philosophical outlook to be flawed, suggesting that his novels were ultimately hindered by their didacticism and excessive focus on sexual themes.

Raymond Williams: A prominent Marxist critic, Williams examined Lawrence's works from a socio-political perspective. In his essay, 'The Tension in the Novel' (1960), Williams discussed the complexities and contradictions in Lawrence's treatment of class, industrialization, and social change.

These critics represent just a few of the many voices that have engaged with D. H. Lawrence's novels over the years. Their analyses and perspectives showcase the diverse ways in which Lawrence's works have been interpreted, reflecting the complexity and richness of his literary contributions.

11.5 D. H. Lawrence's Philosophy of Life

D.H. Lawrence (1885-1930) was an English writer and poet who was known for his unique and controversial perspectives on life, love, and human relationships. While it is challenging to condense his entire philosophy into a few points, some key aspects include:

Vitalism: Lawrence believed in a life force that permeates all living things, which he called the 'blood-consciousness.' He argued that people should be in touch with this force and follow their instincts to live a full and authentic life.

Human relationships and sexuality: Lawrence was a strong advocate of deep emotional and sexual connections between people. He argued that the repression of these natural desires led to emotional and psychological problems. In his works, he often portrayed relationships as a means of personal growth and self-discovery.

Individualism and self-realization: Lawrence emphasized the importance of individualism and self-expression, encouraging people to break away from societal norms and expectations to discover their true selves. He believed that personal growth and fulfilment could only be achieved through honest self-exploration and self-expression.

D. H. Lawrence's Sons and Lovers, published in 1913, stands as a seminal work of English literature and a significant entry in the canon of early 20th-century modernist fiction. It is both a reflection of the author's own life and an exploration of the human condition, delving into themes of love, family, class struggle, and the complex dynamics between parents and children.

Set in the backdrop of the industrial mining community of Nottinghamshire, England, the novel traces the life of Paul Morel, a young man torn between his love for two women, Miriam and Clara, and his loyalty to his domineering mother, Gertrude. Drawing from Lawrence's own experiences growing up in a working-class family, the narrative is a vivid portrayal of the social and economic realities of the time.

One of the major themes in Sons and Lovers is the Oedipus complex, as famously identified by Sigmund Freud. The novel examines the intense bond between Paul and his mother, a relationship that transcends conventional parent-child affection and often borders on the romantic. This dynamic ultimately hinders Paul's ability to form meaningful relationships with other women and leads to a constant struggle to reconcile his loyalty and desire.

The novel also delves into the power dynamics between men and women, showcasing the struggle between the characters' desires for personal fulfilment and the societal expectations placed upon them. The female characters, such as Gertrude, Miriam, and Clara, grapple with their own ambitions and emotions within the confines of a patriarchal society, while Paul wrestles with his role as a son, lover, and man in this world.

Furthermore, Sons and Lovers stands out for its rich and evocative language. Lawrence's prose is marked by its vivid, sensual descriptions, imbuing the novel with a sense of emotional intensity and a keen awareness of the natural world. This stylistic approach has led to Lawrence being hailed as a pioneer of literary modernism and a forerunner of stream-of-consciousness narration.

12.2 The Summary of Sons and Lovers.

In Chapter 1 titled "The Early Married Life of the Morels," the reader is introduced to the main characters and the setting of the story. The novel opens with a description of the Bottoms, a working-class mining community in Nottinghamshire, England.

The protagonist, Gertrude Morel, is a refined and well-educated woman who marries Walter Morel, a passionate but uneducated coal miner. Their marriage begins to deteriorate soon after they move to the Bottoms, where they are surrounded by poverty and a rough environment. At first, the couple is very much in love, and they have a child named William. However, Gertrude quickly becomes disillusioned with her husband's heavy drinking, lack of ambition, and violent temper. The couple frequently argues, and their disagreements escalate to physical altercations. Gertrude channels her frustrations and unfulfilled desires into her children, particularly her firstborn, William. She becomes overly attached to him, hoping that he will grow up to be successful and break free from the confines of their working-class life.

Chapter 1 sets the stage for the rest of the novel by establishing the complex dynamics between the Morel family members and their environment. The strained relationship between Gertrude and Walter, as well as Gertrude's intense bond with her son William, foreshadows the emotional struggles and conflicts that will unfold throughout the story.

In Chapter 2 titled "The Birth of Paul, and Another Battle," the story picks up with the arrival of the Morels' second child, Paul. Gertrude Morel's relationship with her husband, Walter, continues to worsen as he remains unemployed, drinks excessively, and engages in bouts of violence. Walter's irresponsibility and neglect create further tension and resentment between the couple. Gertrude, feeling trapped in her unhappy marriage, finds solace and purpose in her role as a mother. She continues to invest her hopes and dreams in her children, especially William, who is thriving at school and shows great promise. Despite their father's shortcomings, the Morel children are well-loved and cared for by their mother. When Gertrude is pregnant with Paul, she harbours a secret hope that the child will not survive, as she is afraid of bringing another child into their difficult family situation. However, after giving birth to Paul, she instantly forms a strong bond with him, much like the connection she shares with William. One evening, Gertrude and Walter engage in a particularly violent argument, fuelled by Walter's jealousy over the attention his wife gives to their children. Gertrude, fearing for her and her children's safety, locks Walter out of the house. Walter, in a drunken rage, breaks down the door and threatens his family. Gertrude's courage and determination to protect her children are clearly evident in this scene.

This Chapter further develops the strained relationship between Gertrude and Walter Morel, while also introducing Paul as a central character. The strong bond between Gertrude and her children, particularly Paul, foreshadows the themes of love, attachment, and emotional struggle that will continue to be explored throughout the novel.

In Chapter 3 titled "The Casting Off of Morel—The Taking on of William," the passage of time is evident as the Morel children grow older. Gertrude Morel continues to invest her emotional energy into her children, particularly William, while her relationship with her husband, Walter, remains distant and strained. As William matures, he excels academically and wins a scholarship to attend Nottingham High School. His achievements bring pride and joy to Gertrude, who sees William's success as a way for him to escape the limitations of their working-class life. She is determined to give William every opportunity to succeed, often sacrificing her own needs and well-being to support him. Meanwhile, Walter becomes increasingly isolated from the family, as Gertrude and the children distance themselves from him. They view him as a source of embarrassment and disappointment, and the emotional chasm between Walter and his family continues to widen. William's achievements, coupled with his mother's unwavering support, help him secure a job as a junior clerk at a law firm in Nottingham. This new position allows him to move away from home and experience a different life beyond the confines of the Bottoms. However, William's departure also leaves a void in Gertrude's life, as she has heavily relied on him for emotional support and validation.

Chapter 3 highlights the gradual disintegration of the Morel family, with Gertrude and the children pulling away from Walter. The focus on William's success and the expectations placed upon him by his mother foreshadow the emotional complexities and struggles that will arise later in the story, especially regarding the relationship between Gertrude and her other son, Paul.

In Chapter 4 titled "The Young Life of Paul," the narrative shifts its focus to Paul Morel, the second son of Gertrude and Walter Morel. As William pursues his life and career away from home, Gertrude's attention and emotional investment shift towards Paul. Paul is a sensitive and artistic child who, like his brother William, demonstrates a strong bond with his mother. He grows up under her watchful eye and guidance, and her influence on him is unmistakable. Paul's temperament and interests set him apart from his father and their working-class community, and he often finds solace in nature and art. The chapter also introduces Miriam Levers, a girl who lives on a nearby farm with her family. Paul and Miriam develop a friendship that plays a significant role in his life as he grows older. She shares his love for nature, and they often spend time exploring the countryside together. Miriam, who is deeply religious, sees the beauty and spirituality in their surroundings, and this resonates with Paul.

Gertrude's health begins to decline, and she grows more dependent on Paul for emotional support. As a result, their bond deepens further, and the attachment between them becomes more intense. Paul feels a sense of responsibility towards his mother, which impacts his relationships with others, particularly Miriam.

Chapter 4 of Sons and Lovers delves deeper into Paul's character, exploring his interests, relationships, and the growing influence of his mother on his life. The introduction of Miriam Levers provides a foundation for the development of the love triangle that will become central to the story as Paul grapples with his feelings for both Miriam and his mother.

In Chapter 5 titled "Paul Launches into Life," Paul Morel begins his journey into adulthood as he starts working at Jordan's surgical appliance factory in Nottingham. This new job marks a significant transition in his life, providing him with a sense of independence and responsibility. Paul is determined to succeed and make his mother proud, much like William before him. He works diligently and quickly earns the respect of his colleagues and superiors. Despite his dedication to his job, Paul remains passionate about his artistic pursuits, spending his free time painting and drawing. The chapter also explores the evolving relationship between Paul and Miriam Levers. As their friendship deepens, they share their thoughts, dreams, and love for art and literature. Miriam's feelings for Paul grow stronger, but Paul is hesitant to commit to a romantic relationship. His devotion to his mother and his sense of responsibility towards her create an emotional barrier that prevents him from fully embracing a romantic connection with Miriam. Meanwhile, William, who now lives in London and has a successful career, visits his family occasionally. He becomes engaged to a fashionable and lively young woman named Louisa Lily "Gypsy" Denys Western, or Gyp. Gertrude disapproves of the match, feeling that Gyp is superficial and unsuitable for William. Gertrude's intense attachment to her son makes it difficult for her to accept his choice, further highlighting the complicated dynamics between mother and son.

Chapter 5 depicts Paul's entry into the working world and the development of his relationship with Miriam. Additionally, it reveals the emotional struggles that both Paul and William face due to their strong attachment to their mother, which impacts their romantic relationships and personal lives.

In Chapter 6 titled "Death in the Family," tragedy strikes the Morel family when William falls seriously ill. He contracts pneumonia, which quickly worsens, and despite medical attention, he dies. The entire family, especially Gertrude, is devastated by the loss of William. His death leaves a profound void in their lives, with Gertrude suffering the most as she had placed her hopes and dreams in him. The loss of her firstborn son deepens Gertrude's attachment to her remaining son, Paul. She becomes even more emotionally invested in him, seeking solace and companionship in their relationship. This increased dependence on Paul further complicates his emotional life and affects his relationships with others, particularly Miriam. After William's death, the Morel family receives a small inheritance from a distant relative, which brings some financial relief. However, this windfall cannot alleviate the emotional pain and loss they continue to endure. In the meantime, Paul's relationship with Miriam continues to develop, albeit slowly and cautiously. He is drawn to her intellectual and spiritual nature but remains hesitant to fully commit to a romantic relationship. Paul's emotional struggle is intensified by his mother's expectations and his loyalty towards her.

Chapter 6 marks a turning point in the novel, as the death of William has significant consequences on the Morel family, particularly on Gertrude and Paul's relationship. The chapter further emphasizes the complex dynamics of love, loss, and attachment that persist throughout the story.

In Chapter 7 titled "Lad-and-Girl Love," the focus returns to Paul's relationship with Miriam leavers. Paul and Miriam continue to spend time together, sharing their love for nature, art, and literature. Their connection grows stronger, and they begin to develop deeper feelings for one another. Despite their mutual affection, Paul remains hesitant to pursue a romantic relationship with Miriam. His deep attachment to his mother, Gertrude, continues to influence his emotional life and decision-making. Paul struggles with feelings of guilt, fearing that becoming romantically involved with Miriam would betray his mother and their close bond.

Gertrude, aware of the growing connection between Paul and Miriam, becomes increasingly critical of Miriam, whom she sees as a threat to her relationship with her son. She disapproves of Miriam's introspective and spiritual nature, thinking that she is trying to dominate and control Paul. Gertrude's feelings towards Miriam create additional tension in Paul's relationships with both women. Meanwhile, Paul's younger sister, Annie, becomes engaged to a local man named Leonard, further emphasizing the theme of love and relationships in the novel. Annie's engagement causes Paul to reflect on his own romantic prospects and the expectations placed on him by his family.

Chapter 7 delves deeper into the emotional complexities and difficulties faced by Paul as he navigates his relationships with Miriam and his mother. The chapter highlights the ongoing struggle between love, loyalty, and attachment, as well as the impact of family dynamics on personal relationships.

In Chapter 8 titled "Strife in Love," the emotional turmoil in Paul's life continues as he remains torn between his feelings for Miriam and his attachment to his mother, Gertrude. His relationship with Miriam becomes increasingly complicated, as they experience both moments of deep connection and episodes of tension and conflict. Paul's feelings for Miriam continue to grow, and the two share intimate moments of affection. However, he is still reluctant to fully commit to a romantic relationship, as his loyalty to his mother weighs heavily on him. This hesitation frustrates Miriam, who longs for a deeper bond with Paul.

Miriam's family, the leviars, invite Paul to join them on a vacation to Lincoln, where Paul experiences a brief respite from the emotional struggles that define his daily life. During this trip, Paul and Miriam's relationship appears to grow stronger, but the underlying issues remain unresolved. Back home, the tension between Gertrude and Miriam becomes more apparent. Gertrude feels threatened by Miriam's influence on Paul and worries that she will pull him away from his family. This fear exacerbates Gertrude's own insecurities and heightens the emotional strain on Paul. Paul is also introduced to Clara Dawes, a young, attractive, and independent woman separated from her husband, Baxter Dawes. Clara's entrance into the narrative foreshadows future developments in the story, as she will become another significant figure in Paul's life.

Chapter 8 explores the ongoing struggles and complexities in Paul's relationships with Miriam and his mother. The chapter highlights Paul's internal conflict as he tries to navigate his feelings for Miriam while remaining loyal to Gertrude. The introduction of Clara Dawes adds another layer to the story, setting the stage for future events.

In Chapter 9 titled “Defeat of Miriam,” Paul’s emotional struggles continue as he finds it increasingly difficult to balance his feelings for Miriam with his loyalty to his mother, Gertrude. Paul’s career as an artist also starts to take off, providing him with opportunities to showcase his work and gain recognition. Miriam becomes more desperate for a deeper connection with Paul and hopes that their relationship will progress beyond friendship. However, Paul remains resistant to committing to a romantic relationship, partly due to his mother’s disapproval and his own feelings of guilt. Paul’s relationship with Clara Dawes develops further as they become friends. Clara, a passionate and strong-willed woman, intrigues Paul, and he finds himself drawn to her. Although Clara is still legally married to Baxter Dawes, she and Paul begin to form a close bond. Gertrude’s health continues to deteriorate, and Paul becomes increasingly concerned about her well-being. Her condition only reinforces his sense of loyalty and responsibility towards her, further complicating his feelings for Miriam. Eventually, Paul decides to end his relationship with Miriam. He feels that they are incompatible and that their relationship has no future. Despite his affection for her, Paul cannot commit to Miriam, partly due to his attachment to his mother and his emerging interest in Clara.

Chapter 9 marks a significant turning point in the novel, as Paul chooses to end his relationship with Miriam. The emotional turmoil experienced by the characters is heightened, and the introduction of Clara Dawes as a potential love interest for Paul adds another layer of complexity to the story.

In Chapter 10 titled “Clara,” Paul’s relationship with Clara Dawes takes centre stage as his friendship with Miriam comes to an end. Paul is captivated by Clara’s beauty, intelligence, and strength, and he finds himself increasingly drawn to her. Clara, who is estranged from her husband Baxter Dawes, becomes involved with the local Women’s Suffrage movement, fighting for women’s rights and equality. Paul admires her passion and determination, which contrast with Miriam’s introspective and spiritual nature. As Paul and Clara spend more time together, their mutual attraction intensifies, and they embark on a passionate and tumultuous love affair. Despite the undeniable chemistry between them, their relationship is marked by uncertainty and conflict, as Clara remains legally married to Baxter. Paul’s mother, Gertrude, approves of Clara more than she did of Miriam, seeing her as a strong and independent woman. This approval provides some relief for Paul, who has long struggled with balancing his romantic relationships with his loyalty to his mother. However, Gertrude’s declining health continues to weigh on him, causing him considerable distress and worry. Meanwhile, Miriam is heartbroken by the end of her relationship with Paul, but she remains a peripheral figure in his life. Paul occasionally visits her family’s farm, and they continue to share a deep connection, despite the pain of their romantic past.

Chapter 10 shifts focus from Paul’s relationship with Miriam to his passionate affair with Clara Dawes. The complexities of love, loyalty, and emotional turmoil persist as the novel delves into the dynamics of Paul’s new relationship while exploring the consequences of his past with Miriam.

In Chapter 11 titled “The Test on Miriam,” Paul’s relationships with both Clara and Miriam become further complicated. Despite his passionate affair with Clara, Paul is unable to sever his emotional ties to Miriam completely. During a conversation with his mother, Gertrude suggests that Paul should either fully commit to Miriam or leave her alone, as he is causing her pain by maintaining a connection with her while being romantically involved with Clara. Paul’s feelings of guilt and responsibility prompt him to re-evaluate his relationship with Miriam. Paul decides to give his relationship with Miriam another chance, hoping that they can develop a deeper physical connection to complement their emotional bond. However, despite their attempts to be physically intimate, Paul and Miriam’s relationship remains unfulfilled, and they both acknowledge that they are incompatible in this aspect of their lives.

This realization leads Paul to end his relationship with Miriam once again, confirming that they are better suited as friends rather than romantic partners. The emotional toll of this decision weighs heavily on both Paul and Miriam, as they struggle to come to terms with their feelings for one another. Meanwhile, Paul’s relationship with Clara continues, fuelled by their physical passion and shared interests. However, the complexities of their situation, including Clara’s unresolved marriage to Baxter Dawes, cast a shadow over their affair.

Chapter 11 explores the intricacies of Paul’s relationships with Miriam and Clara, highlighting the emotional turmoil and difficult choices he faces. The chapter underscores the theme of love’s complexities and the challenges that arise when balancing emotional, physical, and familial connections.

In Chapter 13 titled “Baxter Dawes,” the tension between Paul and Clara’s estranged husband, Baxter, comes to a head. Baxter, who has been aware of Paul and Clara’s affair, becomes increasingly resentful and confrontational towards Paul. One day, Baxter attacks Paul at work, leading to a physical fight between the two men. Despite their animosity, Paul feels a strange connection to Baxter and later decides to visit him when Baxter falls ill. Surprisingly, Baxter and Paul begin to develop a mutual understanding and even form a tentative friendship. Through their interactions, Paul gains a better understanding of Clara’s past and the reasons for her failed marriage. Paul’s mother, Gertrude, continues to struggle with her health, and her condition worsens. As a result, Paul becomes more emotionally entangled with his mother, feeling an increased sense of responsibility for her well-being. This deepening attachment to Gertrude further complicates Paul’s relationships with Clara and Miriam. Clara, realizing that she cannot fully have Paul’s heart, becomes increasingly dissatisfied with their relationship. She starts to question her own feelings and desires, and her longing for a more stable and committed relationship begins to grow. Clara ultimately decides to reconcile with Baxter, ending her affair with Paul. With Clara’s departure, Paul is left to confront the emotional turmoil and uncertainty that have defined his relationships throughout the novel. He struggles to come to terms with his feelings for both Clara and Miriam, as well as the powerful bond he shares with his mother.

Chapter 13 highlights the complex relationships between the characters and explores the themes of love, loyalty, and self-discovery. As the novel approaches its conclusion, the characters face difficult choices and emotional reckonings that will shape their futures.

In Chapter 14 titled “The Release,” the novel reaches a pivotal point as the Morel family confronts further trials and losses. Gertrude’s health takes a turn for the worse, and her suffering becomes unbearable. Paul, heartbroken by his mother’s decline, makes the excruciating decision to administer a lethal dose of morphine to end her agony. Gertrude’s passing leaves Paul grief-stricken and emotionally untethered. With his mother’s absence, Paul is compelled to address the emotional vacuum left in his life. He reconsiders his relationships with both Clara and Miriam, acknowledging that neither can fill the void his mother’s death has created. Clara, having reconciled with Baxter Dawes, opts to return to her marriage, while the future of Paul’s relationship with Miriam remains uncertain. Although his friendships with Clara and Miriam persist, the romantic dimensions of those relationships have concluded. His bond with Miriam remains powerful, yet they are unable to forge a functional relationship. Consequently, Paul faces his future in solitude, unsure of his trajectory and the person he will become without his mother’s counsel and support.

The novel culminates with Paul venturing into the distance, representing his journey towards self-discovery and an unpredictable future. He must grapple with his own identity and desires while navigating a world forever transformed by the loss of his mother and the intricacies of his relationships. Chapter 14 delivers an evocative and compelling resolution to the novel, delving into themes of love, loss, and personal growth. The characters confront challenging decisions and emotional reckonings, ultimately shaping their destinies and leaving an indelible impact on their lives.

In Chapter 15, “Derelict,” Paul is left to grapple with the loss of his mother and the subsequent emotional void that now dominates his life. He wanders aimlessly, struggling to find meaning and purpose in a world without his mother’s guidance and support. His emotional turmoil is overwhelming, and he considers suicide as a means to escape his pain.

Paul’s relationships with both Clara and Miriam have reached their conclusions. Clara has reconciled with her husband, Baxter Dawes, and returned to her marriage. Meanwhile, Paul’s deep connection with Miriam remains strong, but they both understand that they cannot make a romantic relationship work. During this time, Paul begins to find solace in his art, focusing his energy on painting and drawing. He comes to realize that his future lies in embracing his creative passions and finding a new sense of self that exists independently of his relationships with Clara, Miriam, or his mother. In the end, Paul decides against taking his own life and chooses to embrace the uncertain future before him. He resolves to face his challenges head-on and to pursue his dreams. The novel concludes with Paul’s newfound determination and hope, symbolizing his journey towards self-discovery, healing, and personal growth.

Chapter 15 provides a powerful conclusion to the novel, exploring themes of love, loss, and the resilience of the human spirit. The characters face difficult decisions and emotional reckonings, ultimately shaping their futures and leaving a lasting impact on their lives.

D. H. Lawrence's novel Sons and Lovers (1913) is a semi-autobiographical work that examines the complex relationships between family members, particularly the intense bond between a mother and her sons, against the backdrop of a working-class environment in early 20th century England. The novel is known for its psychological depth and vivid characterizations. Key characters in the book include:

Gertrude Morel: Gertrude is a strong, intelligent, and passionate woman who feels trapped in her marriage to Walter Morel. She becomes emotionally distant from her husband and invests her hopes, dreams, and desires in her sons, particularly Paul. Gertrude's intensity and inability to let go of her sons lead to a destructive, suffocating relationship that affects her sons' lives and their ability to form healthy relationships with others.

Walter Morel: Walter is a coal miner and the patriarch of the Morel family. Though initially charming and passionate, he becomes increasingly irresponsible, abusive, and alcoholic as the story unfolds. His strained relationship with Gertrude and his inability to connect with his children contribute to the overall tension and conflict within the family.

Paul Morel: Paul is the novel's protagonist and the primary focus of Gertrude's emotional attachment. He is a sensitive and artistic young man who struggles to form relationships with women due to the overbearing influence of his mother. His relationships with Miriam Leivers and Clara Dawes reflect his internal conflict and inability to achieve a healthy balance between love, independence, and responsibility.

William Morel: William is the eldest son in the Morel family and Gertrude's first object of emotional attachment. He is ambitious and successful in his career but struggles in his personal life, particularly in his relationship with his fiancée, Lily. His early death deeply affects Gertrude and Paul and further intensifies the bond between them.

Miriam Leivers: Miriam is a deeply religious and introspective young woman who becomes involved with Paul. She is a kindred spirit, sharing his love for art and literature. Their relationship is characterized by emotional intensity and intellectual connection, but Paul's inability to commit and his mother's influence prevent it from flourishing.

Clara Dawes: Clara is a strong-willed, independent, and sensual woman who becomes romantically involved with Paul after separating from her husband. She challenges Paul's views on love and relationships, but their affair is ultimately doomed by Paul's emotional dependence on his mother.

These characters, among others, showcase the novel's exploration of themes such as family dynamics, emotional dependence, the struggle for individuality, and the impact of social and economic circumstances on personal relationships. D. H. Lawrence's Sons and Lovers is a semi-autobiographical novel published in 1913. The novel explores various themes and motifs that reflect the complexities of human relationships, individual development, and social norms in early 20th century England. Some of the key themes and motifs in the novel include:

Oedipus Complex: The novel explores the Oedipus complex, a concept introduced by Sigmund Freud that describes the unconscious sexual desire a child has for the opposite-sex parent. In Sons and Lovers, the protagonist, Paul Morel, has an intense emotional attachment to his mother, Gertrude, which negatively impacts his relationships with other women. This negative drive is known as thanatos or "death instinct."

Class Struggle: The novel delves into the social and economic disparities between the working class and the bourgeoisie. The Morel family's struggles as a working-class family are depicted in stark contrast to the relatively privileged lives of characters like Clara Dawes and Miriam Leivers.

Industrialization: Lawrence portrays the harsh realities of the industrialized world, depicting the working conditions in the mines and factories as dehumanizing and stifling. The negative impact of industrialization on the environment and human relationships is a recurring motif.

Love and Sexuality: Sons and Lovers delves into the complexities of love and sexuality, exploring the blurred lines between maternal love, romantic love, and sexual desire. The novel also examines the impact of societal norms and expectations on relationships and the characters' struggles to reconcile their emotional needs with societal expectations.

Alienation and Isolation: Characters in the novel often experience feelings of alienation and isolation, particularly Paul, who struggles to connect with others and find a sense of belonging. This theme also extends to the fractured relationships within the Morel family.

Art and Creativity: Art serves as a means of self-expression, escape, and a way to connect with others in the novel. Paul's artistic pursuits allow him to explore his inner self and offer a reprieve from the harsh realities of his life.

Gender Roles: The novel explores traditional gender roles and the impact they have on the characters' lives. Gertrude Morel is stifled by her role as a wife and mother, and her dissatisfaction leads to her emotionally depending on her sons, particularly Paul. At its core, the historical novel seeks to blend historical accuracy with imaginative storytelling. Authors often introduce fictional characters who interact with historical figures, events, or settings, providing readers with a personalized and emotionally engaging lens through which they can experience the past. Historical research plays a crucial role in the creation of these novels. These writers sought to portray ordinary people and events, focusing on the mundane aspects of life and the intricacies of human relationships. One of the key characteristics of realist novels is their emphasis on objective observation and the detailed depiction of the external world. Authors meticulously described physical settings, social contexts, and the psychological states of characters, creating a rich and immersive narrative. Furthermore, realist novels often explored themes related to social issues, morality, and the impact of historical and cultural changes on individuals and society. These novels provided readers with insights into the complexities of human behaviour and the consequences of various choices and actions.

Many realist novels also served as platforms for social critique. By shedding light on social injustices, class disparities, and the hardships faced by marginalized individuals, realist authors aimed to raise awareness and encourage readers to reflect on the world around them. Charles Dickens, a prominent realist novelist, vividly depicted the plight of the working class in his novels such as Oliver Twist and Hard Times. Similarly, Leo Tolstoy's Anna Karenina explored the constraints of societal norms and the consequences of infidelity in Russian high society. Many contemporary authors continue to draw inspiration from realist principles, using them as a framework to explore contemporary themes and issues. Writers like Jhumpa Lahiri, with her novel The Namesake, and Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie, with Americanah, employ realist techniques to portray the experiences of immigrants and cultural clashes in the modern world.

The genre's roots can be traced back to the anonymous Spanish work Lazarillo de Tormes (1554), often considered the first picaresque novel. It tells the story of Lazarillo, a poor boy who becomes a servant to various masters, exposing the corruption and hypocrisy of Spanish society. Picaresque novels are episodic in nature, comprising a series of loosely connected episodes and adventures in the Picaro's life. The protagonist often starts from a low social position, such as a beggar, servant, or thief, and moves from one master or situation to another. These novels are known for their satirical tone and social commentary. They critique the flaws and vices of the society they depict, offering a realistic portrayal of the human condition, especially among the lower classes. The Picaro's cleverness, wit, and ability to survive in challenging circumstances become central to the narrative.

Picaresque novels delve into themes such as social injustice, poverty, deception, and the struggle for survival. The Picaro often navigates a corrupt and unjust world, highlighting the disparity between the powerful and the marginalized. The genre also explores the idea of identity and self-discovery, as the Picaro often adopts various disguises and assumes different roles to survive and advance in society. While the Picaro's actions may be morally questionable, picaresque novels offer a critique of the social order rather than a glorification of criminal behaviour. The Picaro is a product of their environment, and their actions are a reflection of the harsh realities they face.

Picaresque novels have had a profound impact on literature and storytelling. They influenced the development of the novel as a literary form, particularly in the episodic structure and the use of first-person narration. Moreover, the Picaro character became a recurring archetype in literature, inspiring future works like Daniel Defoe's Moll Flanders and Henry Fielding's Tom Jones. The influence of the picaresque can also be seen in the character of the "anti-hero" in modern literature. The first picaresque novel in England was Thomas Nashe's Unfortunate Traveller; or, The Life of Jacke Wilton (1594). Many picaresque elements can be found in Henry Fielding's Jonathan Wild (1725), Joseph Andrews (1742), and Tom Jones (1749) and in Tobias Smollett's Roderick Random (1748), Peregrine Pickle (1751), and Ferdinand, Count Fathom (1753).

Picaresque novels offer a compelling and satirical exploration of society through the eyes of a roguish and witty Picaro. These adventurous narratives, filled with humour and social commentary, continue to captivate readers, providing insights into the human condition and the complexities of life in different historical and cultural contexts. The genre's enduring legacy lies in its ability to entertain, challenge, and shed light on the universal human experiences of survival, cunning, and resilience.

13.11. Gothic Novel

A Gothic novel is a type of novel that emphasizes the darker aspects of human nature, and often features supernatural or horror elements. These novels often feature haunted houses, mysterious castles, and other eerie settings, and explore themes such as madness, death, and the supernatural. The gothic novel originated in the 18th century and features elements of horror, romance, and suspense. These novels often include supernatural occurrences, eerie settings, and complex psychological themes. Gothic fiction, also known as Gothic horror, is a genre of literature that combines elements of horror and romance. The genre originated in the 18th century with the publication of Horace Walpole's novel The Castle of Otranto (1764), and became popular throughout the 19th century with the works of authors such as Mary Shelley, Edgar Allan Poe, and Bram Stoker. Walpole's most respectable follower was Ann Radcliffe, whose Mysteries of Udolpho (1794) and Italian (1797) are among the best examples of the genre. Gothic fiction often features supernatural elements, such as ghosts, monsters, and magic, as well as dark, brooding atmospheres, and ominous settings such as castles, mansions, and graveyards. The genre is also characterized by complex, mysterious plots, with themes of death, decay, and the unknown. Many Gothic novels explore the psychology of their characters, particularly their fears and anxieties, and often focus on the struggle between good and evil. Common tropes include the persecuted heroine, the mysterious stranger, and the tyrannical villain. Famous gothic novels include Frankenstein by Mary Shelley and Dracula by Bram Stoker.

13.12. Conclusion:

The form of the novel is a dynamic and ever-evolving literary genre that has adapted to the changing tastes, beliefs, and social landscapes throughout history. From its humble beginnings as a means of entertainment and moral instruction to its present status as a profound art form, the novel has proven its enduring appeal and capacity to reflect the complexities of the human experience. The diverse forms of the novel, including historical, romance, realist, Bildungsroman, science fiction, and epistolary, showcase the genre's versatility and ability to explore a wide range of themes and emotions. Whether it is delving into the depths of human psychology, critiquing societal norms, envisioning possible futures, or offering a glimpse into the past, the novel remains a powerful medium for storytelling and self-expression. As readers continue to immerse themselves in the worlds created by novelists, they discover the profound impact of literature on shaping minds, provoking thought, and fostering empathy. The form of the novel stands as a testament to the human desire for narrative and the enduring power of storytelling as a means to understand ourselves, each other, and the world we inhabit.

13.15. Notes and References

- Narrative: It refers to the storytelling process that conveys a series of events, experiences, or information, usually in a chronological manner, to create a cohesive and engaging account.

14.0. Objectives

The purpose of this unit is to introduce the development of novel in the 20th Century. The twentieth century abandoned the Victorian novel's purpose of narration and entertainment in favour of focusing on the character and unravelling the complicated web of ideas and feelings that ignite the individual. The 20th century novel replaced the order of art represented by the Victorian novel with the disorder of life. Victorian novels depend on the mastery of space and time in an unfolding narrative, while the 20th century novels undermine the idea that space and time which cannot be mastered by anyone, including the author. The 20th century novels resist the subject matter and the settings of the traditional patterns. It challenges the idealization, control and order, and expresses the turmoil and anxiety within each author's psyche. After reading this unit, the learner will understand about 20th century fiction, its different phases of development, select important novelist and novels of the concerned phase, and modernism.

14.1. Introduction

The development of 20th-century British fiction was marked by various literary movements and prominent authors. It started with the Edwardian period, where writers like E.M. Forster and Virginia Woolf explored themes of social class and human relationships. The interwar period witnessed the emergence of the modernist movement, with T.S. Eliot, James Joyce, and D.H. Lawrence pushing the boundaries of narrative techniques and exploring the complexities of human consciousness. Post-World War II, the 'Angry Young Men' movement gained traction, featuring authors like John Osborne and Kingsley Amis, who critiqued societal norms and portrayed disillusionment in the face of changing times. Later, the 1960s and '70s saw the rise of postmodernism, with writers like Salman Rushdie, Ian McEwan, and Julian Barnes playing with narrative structures and exploring cultural hybridity.

The 20th century novel does not follow the humanistic assumptions of Victorian fiction. It challenges the conventional style, structure and narrative technique, and derives the meaning through the form. The 20th century novel counters the idea that it is a creative gesture of the author and the result of historical context. Hence, understanding the process of imitating the external world does not give an insight into the artistry and meaning of the work. It challenges the humanistic notion that there is an original meaning, a center, which can be approached by, and often almost reached by, perceptive reading. Human consciousness is central to most works, and are the major concern of exploration in the novels. The 20th century novels are usually interested in how people behave – what they fear, desire, doubt, need. Although modes of characterization differ, the psychology and morality of characters must be understood as if they were real people, for understanding others like ourselves helps us to understand ourselves.

14.2. Development of Novels in the Twentieth Century: Four Generations

The novels in the 20th century represents the retrospective fusion of these very diverse aesthetic experiments into the comprehensive style or social and psychological temper of a ‘modern’ age. 20th century novel is influenced by rapid industrial development, advanced technology, urbanization, secularization and mass forms of social life. Modernism stressed cultural and personal fragmentation and sought techniques to express this idea. The 20th century novels are often songs of oneself, and anxious, self-doubting ones at that. In varying degrees, Joseph Conrad, E M Forster, Virginia Woolf, James Joyce, Martin Amis, Ian McEwan, and others take their own imaginations as a major subject. In a sense their novels are about the process of transforming life into art. The author’s struggle with his or her subject becomes a major determinant of novel form. In the 1898–1900 Marlow tales, The Rainbow (1915), Ulysses (1922), and Mrs. Dalloway (1925), each author writes to define himself or herself.

The Development of English novels throughout the twentieth century is divided into four distinct generations. The first generation, prior to 1920, was dominated by Henry James and Joseph Conrad. The second generation is the period between the two world wars (1920-1940), which witnessed three influential novelists: Virginia Woolf, D.H. Lawrence, and James Joyce who also represent the high period of modernism in English fiction. The third generation is the post-World War II period saw the rise of writers like Graham Greene, George Orwell and William Golding, who delved into the complexities of moral judgment and crises of faith. The fourth generation is believed to begin after 1960s in the wake of postmodernism. Important novelists of this generation are Angela Carter, Jeanette Winterson, Martin Amis, Ian McEwan, etc.

14.3. First Generation of 20th Century British Fiction

Henry James, an American novelist, focused on detailed character portraits, particularly the impact of European culture on wealthy Americans visiting Europe. He used subtle body language and facial expressions to convey emotions, in contrast to the later stream-of-consciousness technique. Joseph Conrad, on the other hand, explored individuals grappling with moral dilemmas in exotic settings, drawing on his experiences as a sea captain. The other notable writers from this period who did not reach the same level of success as James and Conrad are H.G. Wells, known for his science novels; Arnold Bennett, who wrote realistic stories about ordinary people, John Galsworthy, who depicted the manners of the wealthy, and Somerset Maugham, whose work focused on themes of disillusionment and frustration.

14.3.1. Joseph Conrad (1857–1924)

Conrad is a sharp critic of economic, political and social pretensions, in narratives of greed and rapacity (Nostramo [1904] and Heart of Darkness [1899]), political folly (The Secret Agent [1907] and Under Western Eyes [1911]) and codes of honour (The Secret Sharer [1910] and Lord Jim [1900]). But, above all, his stories are about individuals at moments of crisis when they cross or falter at The Shadow-Line (1917), in the name of one short novel, between innocence and experience. Conrad’s most complex novel, Nostramo, deals with ‘mobility of viewpoint’, with regard to time, space, focalization and other aspects.

Time shifts, flashbacks and juxtapositions of events in Conrad’s complex mosaic narratives intensified the psychological emphases found in Henry James’s novels. Conrad introduced reappearing ‘tellers’ of his tales, most notably his partial alter ego Marlow in Lord Jim, Heart of Darkness and other stories. But Conrad’s moral tales are not those of social niceties and have more in common with the outlook of Hardy than James. Conrad is a sharp critic of economic, political and social pretensions, in narratives of greed and rapacity (Nostramo [1904] and Heart of Darkness [1899]), political folly (The Secret Agent [1907] and Under Western Eyes [1911]) and codes of honour (The Secret Sharer [1910] and Lord Jim [1900]). But, above all, his stories are about individuals at moments of crisis when they cross or falter at The Shadow-Line (1917), in the name of one short novel, between innocence and experience. Yet, what Conrad's stories are about is, generally speaking, less important than the way in which they are told; Cedric Watts characterizes Conrad's most complex novel, Nostromo, in terms of an enormous 'mobility of viewpoint', with regard to time, space, focalization and other aspects. Watts argues that this mobility differentiates Nostromo from all previous novels; certainly, the handling of perspective and of time is an early and distinct example of modernist poetics: 'There are unexpected juxtapositions of events from different times; and Conrad is fond of delaying our decoding of large and small effects: experiences are thrust at us before we are in a position to comprehend their significance'

14.3.2. Dorothy Richardson (1873–1957)

She is a stylistic innovator of great significance even though her works, pre-eminent among which is the sequence entitled Pilgrimage (thirteen volumes beginning with Painted Roofs, 1915–38), are less studied than those of Joyce and Woolf. She was a major developer of the interior-monologue technique and attempted to write a 'feminine' prose to counter the dominance of 'masculine' realism. Her emphasis on psychology and female 'synthetic' consciousness led to a prose style which required a collaboration between author and reader to render fully the life of her characters.

14.4. The Second Generation of 20th Century British Fiction:

Influential novelists in the interwar period which is between the two world wars (1920-1940) are: Virginia Woolf, D.H. Lawrence, and James Joyce. Woolf and Joyce were instrumental in revolutionizing novelistic technique through the development of stream-of-consciousness writing, which delves into the inner thoughts and emotions of characters. Lawrence brought a fresh vitality to the genre with his vibrant storytelling.

Woolf's innovative stream-of-consciousness technique and exploration of psychological complexities in novels like Mrs. Dalloway and To the Lighthouse challenged traditional narrative structures, paving the way for modernist fiction. Joyce's groundbreaking work, particularly his masterpiece Ulysses, pushed the boundaries of narrative experimentation, employing various styles and perspectives to depict ordinary life in extraordinary ways. His use of interior monologue and intricate wordplay marked a significant departure from conventional storytelling. Lawrence, known for works such as Sons and Lovers and Women in Love, delved into the human psyche and sexuality, tackling taboo subjects with frankness. His depiction of emotional intensity and complex relationships added depth to character-driven narratives. Together, these authors revolutionized British fiction by expanding its thematic scope, experimenting with narrative techniques, and challenging societal norms. Their influence on subsequent generations of writers continues to shape the landscape of modern literature.

14.4.1. Virginia Woolf (1842-1941)

Virginia Woolf wrote that "on or about December 10, 1910 human character Changed". Old rules – about sex and race, about home life, art, and propriety – were giving way to new ones, in which freedom, self-realization, and creativity seemed more possible. This change was what Virginia Woolf had in mind when she said that "human character changed": "All human relations have shifted – those between masters and servants, husbands and wives, parents and children. And when human relations change there is at the same time a change in religion, conduct, politics, and literature." The novel also changed because artists increasingly felt that the modern world required different kinds of art. The search for innovation in form and technique is inseparable from the search for values in a world where the British empire had lost its sense of invulnerability, the political leadership had suffered a crisis of confidence, and industrialization had created worker unrest.

'[W]hat is reality? And who are the judges of reality?', Virginia Woolf asked in an essay on 'Character in Fiction' published in the literary journal Criterion in 1924. 426). 'Is life like this? Must novels be like this?'

Woolf's first essay is entitled 'Modern Fiction' (1919). It decries the 'materialists' for writing about 'unimportant things', spending immense industry making the transitory appear enduring and important, the same accusation levelled at James by Wells but for entirely opposite reasons. Woolf admires the enormous number of details assembled by Bennett and Wells, but she says: 'Life escapes: and perhaps without life nothing else is worthwhile'. In opposition to the mass of facts accumulated by the realists, Woolf says that the interest for modern(ist) authors 'lies very likely in the dark places of psychology'. In the most well-known passage in the essay, Woolf describes what she means by 'life': 'Examine for a moment an ordinary mind on an ordinary day. The mind receives a myriad impression – trivial, fantastic, evanescent, or engraved with the sharpness of steel. From all sides they come, an incessant shower of innumerable atoms.'

Life is not a series of gig-lamps symmetrically arranged but a luminous halo, a semi-transparent envelope surrounding us from the beginning of consciousness to the end. Is it not the task of the novelist to convey this varying, this unknown and uncircumscribed spirit, whatever aberration or complexity it may display, with as little mixture of the alien and external as possible?

She concludes that with the coming of the new novelists there will be revolutionary changes: 'The literary convention of the time is so artificial . . . that, naturally, the feeble are tempted to outrage, and the strong are led to destroy the very foundations and rules of literary society. Signs of this are everywhere apparent. Grammar is violated; syntax disintegrated'. Such moments lead a different kind of novel writing which has no proper beginning, or information about the characters, time, place, etc. The reader would never understand why the beginning is in a particular way, and what relation it has with the successive narratives. For instance, the beginning of Woolf's Mrs. Dalloway:

Mrs. Dalloway said she would buy the flowers herself.

For Lucy had her work cut out for her.

The doors would be taken off their hinges; Rumpelmayer's men were coming.

Compare the above with the beginning of Jane Austen's Emma which provides complete information about the character's name, appearance, personality, economic status, age, etc. in the first sentence itself.

Emma Woodhouse, handsome, clever, and rich, with a comfortable home and happy disposition, seemed to unite some of the best blessings of existence; and had lived nearly twenty-one years in the world with very little to distress or vex her.

14.4.2. James Joyce (1882-1941)

One great part of every human existence is passed in a state which cannot be rendered sensible by the use of wideawake language, cutanddry grammar and go-ahead prose', James Joyce declared while writing Finnegans Wake. James Joyce is unusual in being a major 'modernist' who did not write extensively on modernist aesthetics. It was not until 1914 that Joyce managed to get his book of short stories, Dubliners, published. The stories are written with deceptive simplicity and deal successively with events of childhood, youth and adulthood. Some show the nullifying effect of the Dublin social and mental environment on characters whose dreams, hopes and ambitions are pathetically or tragically unfulfilled. The rhythm of aspiration and disappointment or resignation recurs at various levels of sophistication; and the element of stylization in the patterning of the material, together with the evident recourse to symbolism, foreshadows Joyce's later work.

A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man had been long a-writing when it came out in 1916. It reworked much material in Stephen Hero. Joyce at once hugs his hero close in sympathy and distances him in irony: the resultant blend of pathos and humour is piquant. Of course, Stephen's recollections of home, school, first love, and awakening cultural interests have an unmistakably authentic core; but the final artistic self-dedication is to 'silence, exile, and cunning', and silence and cunning imply abandonment of direct openness. The adoption of literary subterfuges—symbolism, labyrinthinism, and formality hidden inside naturalism—are as important in the total artistic vocation as the need by exile to escape Irish politics, religion and sentimentality. Joyce's presentation of Stephen's experience from within Stephen's own mind involves use of styles in tune with infant thought, childhood thought, adolescent thought and student thought successively. Sensitive adjustment of idiom to the thinker's moods and understanding, whether they are healthy or not, involves walking on a stylistic tightrope stretched precariously between involvement and detachment. The thematic use of images establishes continuing symbolic connections. Stephen Dedalus's own name brings together that of the first Christian martyr and that of the arch artificer of classical legend.

A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man tells a familiar story: that of a boy growing to young manhood and finding a vocation. But the way the book begins is a surprise:

Once upon a time and a very good time it was there was a moocow coming down along the road and this moocow that was coming down along the road met a nicens little boy named baby tuckoo.

His father told him that story: his father looked at him through a glass: he had a hairy face.
He was baby tuckoo. The moocow came down the road where Betty Byrne lived: she sold lemon platt.

O,                    the                    wild                    rose                    blossoms
                         On                    the                    little                    green                    place.
He                    sang                    that                    song.                    That                    was                    his                    song.
O,                    the                    green                    wothe                    botheth.

When you wet the bed first it is warm then it gets cold. His mother put on the oil sheet. That had the queer smell.

The first words here are familiar enough. What could be more traditional than beginning, “once upon a time”? But what follows was (in 1916) new and strange: the words seem to be said and heard directly from life itself, without planning or purpose; they let silly baby-talk cheapen the language of literature; they make a joke of storytelling customs, and they plunge us directly into an unfamiliar world, without the kind of preparation (scene-setting, introductory explanations) that might normally ease us in. Gone is any welcoming narrator, any clear or “objective” descriptions – any proper beginning.

14.4.3. D.H. Lawrence (1825-1930)

If we turn now to another of the foremost writers of 20th Century, D. H. Lawrence’s main contributions outside of his novels and stories to the revolution of novel were essays written in the 1920s, though some were not published until his collected non-fictional prose was assembled under the title Phoenix in 1936. The most important are ‘The Novel’ (1925), ‘Morality and the Novel’ (1925), ‘Why the Novel Matters’ (mid-1920s, published 1936) and ‘Surgery for the Novel – or a Bomb’ (1923). In these essays, Lawrence, like Woolf, asserts his belief in ‘life’, though he defines it differently, as ‘something that gleams, that has the fourth-dimensional quality’ (‘Morality and the Novel’, 1971: 178). In ‘Why the Novel Matters’, he explains why the novelist is ‘superior’ to the philosopher or scientist, or even poet, who only deal with parts of ‘life’:

Nothing is important but life. . . . For this reason, I am a novelist. . . . The novel is the one bright book of life. Books are not life. They are only tremulations on the ether. But the novel as a tremulation can make the whole man tremble. Which is more than poetry, philosophy, science, or any other book-tremulation can do.

In ‘Morality and the Novel’, in a sentence that partly explains the symbol in the title of one of his most important books, he adds: ‘The novel is the perfect medium for revealing to us the changing rainbow of our living relationships’. It is the importance of relationships and relatedness to ‘life’ that Lawrence avers in this essay and which he puts forward as the reason why the novel, ‘the highest example of subtle interrelatedness that man has discovered’, is morally important. The essay begins: ‘The business of art is to reveal the relation between man and his circumambient universe, at the living moment’, and goes on to say that ‘life consists in this achievement of a pure relationship between ourselves and the living universe’.

14.5. Third Generation of 20th Century British Fiction

The third generation of 20th century novelist depict the life and condition after the second world war. They bring out how the violence has affected not just the social and political sphere but also the literary landscape. Graham Greene, George Orwell, and William Golding significantly contributed to 20th-century British fiction. Greene’s works explored moral dilemmas and the human condition in political and religious contexts, such as Brighton Rock and The Power and the Glory. Orwell’s powerful social and political critiques, like 1984 and Animal Farm, highlighted totalitarianism and dystopian themes. Golding’s masterpiece Lord of the Flies delved into the darker aspects of human nature. Together, their thought-provoking narratives and themes shaped the literary landscape, offering profound insights into the complexities of society, politics, and human nature during a transformative era of British literature.

14.5.1. Graham Greene (1904-1991)

Greene is undoubtedly a major novelist of this century, in style and content, "among the few, the very few, of our great living novelists". The contest of good and evil rages throughout his novels. In all his novels is the ceaseless striving for grace that frees men of the bondage of sin. His best novels are The Ministry of Fear, The Heart of the Matter and Our Man in Havana. The Ministry of Fear was written in Freetown, Sierra Leone, considered a backyard of the British Empire, where Greene, recruited by his sister Elisabeth, was placed as an agent of the Secret Service from 1941 to 1943. He would decode telegrams and reply to them or write reports. It tells a story about a man called Rowe who once killed his wife out of pity because she was ill. The second murder in his life is only a made up as a means to make him afraid. He knows he did not commit the second murder but is afraid of being punished, so he tries to escape. Anna Hilfe, a sister of his pursuer and a German spy tries to help him and they fall in love. There is the aspect of responsibility of one towards the other, since, at the end, each of them wants to protect the other from such harmful knowledge that they both have. Greene's masterpiece, The Heart of the Matter, tells the story of a good man enmeshed in love, intrigue, and evil in a West African coastal town. Scobie is bound by strict integrity to his role as assistant police commissioner and by severe responsibility to his wife, Louise, for whom he cares with a fatal pity. Greene's next novel Our Man in Havana published in 1958 and classified by the author as an "entertainment." Set in Cuba before the communist revolution, it is a comical spy story about a British vacuum-cleaner salesman's misadventures in the British Secret Intelligence Service.

14.5.2. George Orwell (1903-1950)

The social system is under judgement from a very different angle in the work of George Orwell (pseudonym of Eric Blair, 1903–50). From self-immersion among the social dregs emerged such books as Down and Out in Paris and London (1933) and The Road to Wigan Pier (1937). Orwell's most celebrated books came late in his short life. Disillusioned with Communism (after fighting in Spain), he wrote Animal Farm (1945), a satirical fable on revolution that has turned totalitarian. The animals oust tyrant Jones and take over the farm themselves, but the pigs get on top, convinced of their own superiority. It is for the good of the community as a whole that, being the brains of the state, they should be well served by the others. The revolutionary slogan, 'All Animals are Equal', is amended to suit the new situation: 'But Some Animals are More Equal than Others'. 1984 (1949) looks prophetically into the future and foresees the triumph of totalitarianism so complete that individual thought is eradicated. A Ministry of Truth feeds the nation with lies and propaganda in the name of education, culture and news. A Ministry of Love operates the insidious Thought Police, while the Ministry of Plenty cuts the rations down and the Ministry of Peace runs the permanent war. An instrument of repression is 'New-speak', the approved language from which concepts dangerous to the prevailing non-thought, are eliminated. The reader follows gloomily the crushing of a rebel, Winston Smith, who deviates into the pursuit of privacy and love. Monochrome relentlessness gives the book a certain sourness.

14.5.3. William Golding (1911-1993)

William Golding's Lord of the Flies is a story of a group of British boys stranded in an unknown deserted Island. The children are gathered on the Island because their rescuing plane is shot down. The boys come to know that they are on an Island, and there are no "adults" there, and they have no authority, so they democratically elect Ralph as their leader. Jack is unhappy with Ralph's election since he wants himself to be the leader, however, he is content with after being the chief of the hunters. The boys decide that they will keep a fire as a signal for their rescue, make shelters and arrange foods. Ralph emphasizes on keeping a fire going, while Jack and his hunters search for pigs on the island. They have sufficient materials on the Island to survive: water, fruits, wild pigs, etc. Unfortunately, with the passage of time, their rules break down, Jack declares himself the leader of his hunting tribe, Piggy is killed, atmosphere is full of violence and fear, and Ralph is left alone. All except Ralph have turned into savage threatening lives of each other. In the end, they are saved by army personnel. The actions of the children on the Island are microcosmic representation of the war-torn world.

Historically, there is no time-frame for the novel, but it set sometime around the 1950s, just after the World War II. There are many implied references to this War. England was terribly hit by the War and a fear of destruction was prevailing. Europe was in ruins. Children were direct witness to such brutality despite most of the parents tried to send their children out of the country for safety.

The novel is rooted in the historico-political and social circumstances of that time. However, it does not limit its meaning and interpretations. The novel can be considered a fable or a piece of adolescent literature, but the questions which it raises are relevant to across time and space. The questions are relevant for social, cultural, political, religious/theological, institutional, and psychological arena of human existence.

The novel is an exploration of the very “essence” or “being” of humankind. It makes one consider who is civilized? Who is savage? How long and under what circumstances can one maintain rationality and goodness? What is the nature of human beings? Are they essentially good? Do their sophistication and goodness depend on fear of legal and institutional actions along with social and moral codes? As Patrick Reilly points out that Piggy’s questions about the nature of human beings, “What are we? Humans? Or animals? Or savages?” are important everywhere witnessing brutality, barbarism, and violence. Golding examines basic human nature and helps his readers gain “a renewed sense of the difficulty and complexity of the moral life and the opacity, perhaps even the evil, of people”. Human beings have largely a propensity towards evil, and this is the reason that Golding compares the children with animals: Ralph is “like a seal” and eats meat “like a wolf;” Jack is “dog-like” or “ape-like;” the Twins, Sam and Eric, “lay grinning and panting at Ralph like Dogs;” the “littluns” appear to running around like insects”. Piggy at one point asks “We’ll be like animals”. Ralph calls Jack “a beast and swine and a bloody, bloody thief”.

14.6. Fourth Generation of 20th Century British Fiction

The fourth generation of 20th century British Fiction has taken shape since the 1960s with the advancement of postmodernism. The period also witnessed free-market globalism and thereby forcing a massive rearrangement of the cultural sector. The novelists focus on the social, political, economic, and ideological determinants that shaped the life and world of literature. Some of the important works in this regard are as follows:

14.6.1. Angela Carter (1940-1992)

Angela Carter’s The Passion of New Eve (1977) is an innovative and experimental exploration into the way in which gender is constructed in contemporary society. The novel involves the adventures of a character that begins the book as a man, but ends it, through an enforced sex change, as a woman. Evelyn thus becomes the new Eve of the title. On the way he/she encounters a number of grotesque characters that engage in either sexual or violent (or both) relationships with the main protagonist. These include Leilah, a black prostitute he meets in New York, Mother, the leader of an underground women’s group, and zero, a mad misogynist poet who has a harem of subservient women. Eve/lyn eventually encounters Tristessa, an iconic screen goddess that, in an inversion of Eve/lyn’s storyline, turns out to be a man. The novel attaches radical feminism to a series of other marginalized groups in American culture that were engaged in various forms of political resistance including Black, Hispanic and Gay Rights groups. Evelyn’s transformation into a woman is presented as a fantastic event.

14.6.2. Jeanette Winterson (1959 -)

Jeanette Winterson’s Oranges Are Not the Only Fruit (1985) interrogating the articulation of sexual identities in British society through the experiences of a character recognizing her lesbian identity within a closed society that rejects same-sex relationships. These two novels are similar in their use of postmodern narrative techniques. The main character is called Jeanette. Jeanette’s sexuality offers another challenge to the traditional codes of masculinity and femininity. When Pastor Finch tries to account for the relationship Jeanette has with Melanie, he argues that it is due to Jeanette subverting the established roles between men and women. The novel, then, sets out to challenge the connection between religion and conventional discourses of gender and sexuality that, in the Protestant Christian church (both High Church and non-Conformist variations), traditionally upholds the heterosexual nuclear family as the ideal social unit. The direct target is the form of Old Testament, non-Conformist Evangelism that Jeanette’s mother practices.

14.6.3. Martin Amis (1949-2023)

Martin Amis’s London Fields (1989) is a novel about writing novels and about playing around with fiction’s relationship to reality. It is also about the way in which fiction, in its broadest sense, affects the formation of identity: how people create narratives in order to understand their place in the world. In doing so, it seeks to undermine some of the grand narratives by which we have come to understand and interpret the late-twentieth and early twenty-first-century world. The novel opens with a “true story” of a murder by the protagonist Samson Young, who is a fictitious novelist. The technique metafiction in London Fields provides us with a series of narrative levels that contribute to the questioning of who has narrative authority in the text

14.6.4. Zadie Smith (1975 -)

Zadie Smith’s White Teeth (2000) is Zadie Smith’s first novel. The novel deals with a variety of ethnic cultures and backgrounds: the three interconnected families of the Joneses, the Iqbal and the Chalfens. This represents a variety of ethnicities that included English, Asian and Caribbean, and the introduction of Joyce and Marcus Chalfen in the second half of the novel extends this multiethnic framework to a middle-class family that combines a white English (Joyce) and East European Jewish (Marcus) background. The novel moves through three generations identifying these characters. White Teeth also has a broad historical canvas which in essence covers the whole of the twentieth century (with one episode going back to the Indian Mutiny of 1857). Smith explores the issues of multiculturalism through a negotiation of sameness and difference.

14.7. Conclusion:

From the modernist experimentation of Virginia Woolf and James Joyce to the post-war realism of George Orwell and Graham Greene, British fiction underwent significant transformations. The century also witnessed the rise of groundbreaking writers like William Golding, Angela Carter, Ian McEwan and others, who captured the imagination of readers worldwide. Throughout the era, British fiction reflected the complexities and contradictions of society, grappling with issues such as class, gender, identity, and the human condition. The fusion of diverse cultural influences, the impact of two World Wars, and the evolution of technology all left indelible imprints on the literary landscape. As the 20th century drew to a close, British fiction continued to evolve, embracing new genres, themes, and narrative forms.

Overall, this unit explores the contributions of various novelists in each generation and how they shaped the development of English novels throughout the twentieth century. It highlights the different styles, themes, and techniques employed by these writers, ranging from the detailed character portraits of James and Conrad to the experimental stream-of-consciousness writing of Woolf and Joyce. Old plots and styles of description were insufficient in capturing the new experiences and landscapes of the era. The 20th century novel provided a means to expose hypocrisies, interpret technological developments, and challenge the very foundations of civilization. By delving into the complexities of the human mind and employing new styles and perspectives, the 20th century novel became a potent tool for illustrating and communicating the profound effects of modernity. The 20th century novel emerged as a vehicle to dramatize thought, to depict the fluid and elusive sequences of feelings, and to delve into the minds of characters who were either morally blind or exceptionally insightful. It developed new styles and tactics to do justice to the mind's intricate and multifaceted nature. In response to the demands of modernity, 20th century novel embraced new questions, subjects, and perceptions. It sought to remold itself to better reflect the reality of the changing world. By exploring the inner life of characters, fiction was able to expose the contradictions and complexities inherent in society. It provided a means to interpret the technological advancements that characterized modernity, allowing readers to understand their implications and significance.

15.0. Objectives:

In the unit, we will try to initiate a base for situating James Joyce and his body of writings in the modernistic trend for the learners doing this course through distance mode. It also provides a concise and informative introduction to the life, literary contributions, and enduring impact of the iconic Irish author. It aims to highlight key works, themes, and innovations in Joyce's writing, offering readers a glimpse into the complexities of his literary legacy. Understanding the background, the works and the techniques of Joyce would set the ground for understanding the modern fiction.

15.1. Introduction:

James Joyce, an Irish literary titan of the 20th century, stands as one of the most influential and enigmatic figures in the world of literature. Joyce's groundbreaking works have left an indelible mark on the modernist movement, redefining the possibilities of language and narrative in fiction. Joyce's exploration of the human psyche, the complexities of identity, and the interplay between the individual and society is unrivaled. His writing style, often characterized by stream-of-consciousness and inventive wordplay, challenged conventional storytelling norms, offering readers a glimpse into the inner workings of his characters' minds. His seminal work, Ulysses (1922), remains a pinnacle of literary innovation and a cornerstone of modernist literature. This sprawling masterpiece artfully weaves together various literary forms and allusions while encapsulating a single day in the life of Dublin's residents. It is celebrated for its depth, linguistic experimentation, and ability to capture the essence of the human condition. Prior to Ulysses, Joyce released A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man (1916), a semi-autobiographical Bildungsroman that chronicles the intellectual and emotional development of Stephen Dedalus. The novel offers an introspective examination of identity, religion, and artistic growth, embodying themes that Joyce would further explore in his later works. Beyond his prose, Joyce also composed the captivating novella The Dead (1914), a part of his collection Dubliners. This poignant tale delves into themes of mortality, love, and the haunting presence of the past, showcasing Joyce's ability to create a moving narrative within a concise framework. However, Joyce's immense literary achievements were not without controversy. His novel Finnegans Wake (1939) epitomizes his penchant for linguistic experimentation to such an extent that it has often been deemed one of the most challenging and cryptic works in the English language. Despite its complexity, it has garnered admiration for its daring approach to language and its attempt to mirror the subconscious mind's dreamlike logic. Throughout his life, Joyce's relationship with Ireland and its political climate remained intricate, and his works were often scrutinized and censored for their candid portrayal of Irish society and culture. Nevertheless, his legacy endures, and his influence reverberates through the works of countless authors who followed in his footsteps. In this introduction, we embark on a journey through the life and literary universe of James Joyce, exploring the themes, styles, and profound impact of a writer who forever altered the course of modern literature.

Lauded as the greatest innovators of the modern period James Joyce literary career flourished when he was “driven out of my country here as a misbeliever” but his body of works never failed to portray the immense faith he had for Ireland. The aspects of Joyce’s life in Ireland not only form the plot of his works but also the settings., his flair for languages; and his general unease with institutions of various kinds. Joyce’s spirited attempt to “try myself against the powers of the world” led to the overflow of daring style, wide-ranging experimentation and his constant preoccupation with language all of which have contributed to his stature as a novelist.

15.2.Ireland and Parnell:

Before delving into the background and the followed up turns in the life of James Joyce, it is important to devote some time in understanding how the history of Ireland in Joyce’s time was important for him to be(now) a singular modernist writer. Ireland was predominantly a Catholic country. Charles Steward

Parnell was a Protestant and yet his indomitable personal charisma made him the leading spokesman for the Irish Nationalist cause in the British Parliament. But a moment of crisis arose when the narrowness and bigotry of the leaders of Catholic Church and the then English Prime Minister Gladstone made them dissociate themselves from Parnell. Parnell who had recently suffered the political decline in his career as a result of his romantic involvement with a married woman, Kitty O'Shea, a year later he died of exhaustion in a fervent attempt to build up a new independent party. Parnell's downfall and his subsequent death were important in Joyce's life not only because they made him aware of the disparity between Church and State in Ireland, but also because they created within the mind of a boy who had admired Parnell's heroism, a fear that Ireland would always destroy its own prophets.

Joyce didn't shy away from mentioning this betrayal of Parnell in the opening section and on the exchanges between students in the closing stages of the novel A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man where Stephen says to Davin with odd violence: "Do you know what Ireland is?" "...Ireland is the old saw that eats her farrow. (p.220). Thus, this incident can be rightly said to have formed was a part of the Irish psyche of those times. Joyce had a firm belief that political subjection had led the Irish people to have a slavish mentality. What Ireland needed was an expansion of consciousness. In this context, we can conclude that Joyce's attitude to nationalism and to the Irish Catholic hierarchy were both substantially affected by this awareness.

15.3. James Joyce's life and background:

James Augustine Aloysius Joyce (1882-1941) was novelist, born at Rathgar, Dublin. Son of a dutiful mother and a charming but improvident father, Joyce was the oldest of ten surviving children. The sense of the effect of spatial shifts in his novels is a reflection of the Joyce family's frequent changes of residence. Between 1888 and 1902 Joyce's education was first at Clongowes Wood College (early schooling), Belvedere College, Dublin (subsequent schooling) and University College, Dublin (from where he received his B.A. degree in 1902).

Dissatisfied with the narrowness and bigotry of Irish Catholicism, as he saw it, Joyce then went to Paris for a year in 1902, where he lived in poverty, wrote verse, and discovered Dujardin's novel Les Lauriers sont coupés (1888), which he was later to credit as the source of his own use of interior monologue. He returned to Dublin for his mother's death, stayed briefly in the Martello tower of Ulysses with Gogarty, then left Ireland with Nora Barnacle, the woman with whom he spent the rest of his life, and who bore him a son and a daughter. They lived at Trieste for some years, where Joyce taught English at the Berlitz school and made the acquaintance of Svevo, whose writing he encouraged; they moved in 1915 to Zurich, and settled finally after the war in Paris.

A good linguist from an early age he read and studied widely and in 1901 wrote a letter of profound admiration in Dano-Norwegian to Ibsen. His first published work was a volume of verse, Chamber Music (1907), followed by Dubliners (1914), a volume of short stories published after great delays and difficulties, culminating in his final visit to Ireland in 1912. When the stories at last appeared they were greeted with enthusiasm by Pound, in a review in the Egoist. Pound's friendship and support greatly encouraged Joyce's career and reputation. Another important ally gained at this period was Harriet Shaw Weaver, business manager and then editor of the Egoist, and a lifelong benefactress of Joyce. Difficulties also attended the performance and publication of Joyce's play, Exiles. It was published in 1918 and was staged unsuccessfully the same year in Munich, then first performed in London by the Stage Society in 1926 after years of hesitation. It was later revived and directed by Pinter in 1970.

A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, a largely autobiographical work, was published serially in the Egoist, 1914-15 (part of a first draft, Stephen Hero, appeared in 1944). His famous novel Ulysses was first published in Paris on 2 Feb. 1922, and was received as a work of genius by writers as varied as T. S. Eliot, Hemingway, and Arnold Bennett. Another small volume of verse, Pomes Penyeach, appeared in 1927, and his second great work, Finnegans Wake, extracts of which had already appeared as 'Work in Progress', was published in its complete form in 1939. Ulysses and Finnegans Wake revolutionized the form and structure of the novel, decisively influenced the development of the 'stream of consciousness' or 'interior monologue' and pushed language and linguistic experiment (particularly in the latter work) to the extreme limits of communication.

15.4. James Joyce's literary output:

James Joyce is one of the great innovators in twentieth century literature. Joyce's relationship to what is often loosely called the modernist movement, makes him experiment with different techniques in the use of language which follows inevitably from his purpose of trying to take all possible points of view simultaneously. Modernist artists at the beginning of the century were to a large degree moved to this unprecedented freedom and confidence in stylistic experiment by what they saw as radically new ideas, current in that period, concerning consciousness, time and the nature of knowledge. Joyce's contribution to modern English prose is to provide a more fluid medium for refraction sensations and impressions through the author's mind – to facilitate the transition from photographic realism to aesthetic impressionism.

15.4.1. *Dubliners

Though in the later literary outputs Joyce would change the course of modern English literature, he at the very onset launched himself in the literary market impregnating his first published collection of stories with naturalism and urban realism. Dubliners is a collection of fifteen short stories which got published in 1914. The stories figuring in this collection follow a pattern of childhood, adolescence, maturity, and public life as seen in The Sisters, An Encounter, Araby, Eveline, After the Race, Two Gallants, The Boarding House, A Little Cloud, Counterparts, Clay, A Painful Case, Ivy Day in the Committee Room, A Mother, Grace and The Dead, which happens to be the longest and 'the finest short story in English'. All these tales carry a strain of Irish nationalism at their core essence as Joyce also intended to put these out as 'chapter of the moral history [of Ireland]'. Again, the intension behind setting these stories in Dublin was 'because that city seemed to [him] the center of paralysis', thus became his first attempt in the spiritual liberation of Ireland even in the period of his voluntary exile. The stories center on Joyce's idea of an epiphany: a moment when a character experiences a life-changing self-understanding or illumination. Many of the characters in Dubliners later appear in minor roles in Joyce's novel Ulysses. Because of Joyce's frankness and his insistence on publishing without deletion or alteration, he found himself, in the first of what would be several battles with publishers who refused to print his work without excisions, as well as the focus of a brief campaign for freedom to publish.

15.4.2. *A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man

A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, is an auto biographical novel by James Joyce, first published in the Egoist, 1914-15. It is one of the superior examples of a Kunstler roman (an artist's Bildungsroman) in English literature in which we come in terms with the development of an artist, Stephen Dedalus in his confusion and rebellion against the Catholic and Irish Conventions of his upbringing. Though not as innovative as the later work (its experimentation lies principally in its prose style changing as the novel progresses to mirror the growth and development of Stephen's mind), the novel started to experiment with interior monologue and free indirect discourse (in which the style shifts to match the 'center of consciousness' on that page, changing in complexity and reference as the character develops).

In the opening of A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, Joyce manages what the other major modernists of the period also achieved: the complete recreative and parodic mastery of previous traditions. The elementary vocabulary, lack of punctuation, and simple, associative sentences of the very first section reflects the mode of apprehensions characteristic of a small but sensitive child: "When you wet the bed first it is warm then it gets cold. His mother put on the oilsheet. That had the queer smell. His mother had a nicer smell than his father. She played on the piano the sailor's hornpipe for him to dance." The first part is thus not baby talk, and it is far from a realistic stream of consciousness method. It is suggestive style and more impressionistic. It is designed to give us the notion of the way world appears to the infant consciousness, and all the while it is language as carefully planned and as synecdochical in function as poetry. In sharp contrast are the fragmented diary entries of the last pages. It ends with a different narrative perspective which throws the entire novel into a new relief. The diary entries range between the detached sardonic and the committed ecstatic and they project that stage of the young artist when he is about to take flight and leave behind him the 'nets' in which the world has tried and failed to hold his spirit. The stylistic innovation of the opening and closing pages launches Joyce into an original modernist experimentalism which is almost wholly unpredictable in terms of the earlier influences.

In describing and analysing Stephen's subjective world, Joyce uses several times in the course of the narrative, the technique what is known as the stream of consciousness or interior monologue.

For instance in Chapter II, Section iv, we come across what can be indicative of stream of consciousness: "Stephen walked on at his father's side, listening to stories he had heard before, hearing again the names of the scattered and dead revellers who had been the companions of his father's youth. And a faint sickness sighed in his heart. He recalled his own equivocal position in Belvedere, a free boy, a leader afraid of his own authority, proud and sensitive and suspicious, battling against the squalor of his life and against the riot of his mind...."

Again, Stephen's agony on hearing father Arnall's sermon is described by a method close to interior monologue: "Every word of it was for him. Against his sin, foul and secret, the whole wrath of God was aimed. The preacher's knife had probed deeply into his disclosed conscience and he felt now that his soul was festering in sin.... The sordid details of his orgies stank under his very nostrils. The soot-coated packet of pictures which he had hidden in the flue of the fireplace and in the presence of whose shameless or bashful wantonness he lay for hours sinning in thought and deed...." [Chapter III, Section ii]

Much of Stephen's spiritual development, almost all its positive side which tends towards aesthetic fulfilment, is conveyed through epiphanies. The major epiphanies in the book occur as the symbolic climaxes of the larger dialectical movements covering each of the five chapters. Each chapter begins with a multitude of warring impressions; each develops towards an emotionally apprehended unity. Each succeeding chapter liquidates the previous synthesis and subjects its elements to a more adult scrutiny, developing towards its own synthesis and affirmation. Joyce's doctrine of the epiphany assumes that reality does have wholeness and harmony and that it will radiantly show forth its character and its meaning to the prepared and consciousness, for it is only in the body of reality that meaning can occur and only there that the artist can find it. The epiphany is usually the result of a gradual development of the emotional content of associations, as they accrete with others. Among Stephen's childish impressions is that of "a woman standing at the half door of a cottage with a child in her arms." This early impression enters into emotional context later with the story which Davin tells him about stopping at night at the cottage of a peasant woman; and Stephen's image of the woman is for an epiphany of the soul of Ireland to which he refers as "a batlike soul walking to the consciousness of itself in darkness and secrecy and loneliness.”Thus, Joyce has managed a distinctive reinvention of symbolist experience through the ‘epiphanic’ moments of a portrait and its aesthetic theory and he has revived and immeasurably extended the presentation of the ‘stream of consciousness’, which was previously found. James Joyce’s A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man is thus a text of modernism which charts the development of the subjectivity of the artist that we see in the character of Stephen when he finally decides to leave Ireland.

15.4.3. *Ulysses

Ulysses, a novel by James Joyce was serialized in the Little Review from 1918 the brunt of which was bore by the editors as they were found guilty of publishing obscenity. Following this massive outburst against his novel, it saw its publication in a non-English speaking country, published in Paris by Sylvia Beach in 1922. The novel deals with the events of one day in Dublin, 16 June 1904 (the anniversary of Joyce's first walk with Nora Barnacle, who became his wife), now known as 'Bloomsday'. The principal characters are Stephen Dedalus (the hero of Joyce's earlier, largely autobiographical, A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man); Leopold Bloom, a Jewish advertisement canvasser; and his wife Molly. The plot follows the wanderings of Stephen and Bloom who are portrayed through techniques such as interior monologue, dialogue, and soliloquy, through Dublin, and their eventual meeting. The last chapter is a monologue by Molly Bloom. The various chapters roughly correspond to the episodes of Homer's Odyssey, Stephen representing Telemachus, Bloom Odysseus, and Molly Penelope. In the course of the story a public bath, a funeral, a newspaper office, a library, public houses, a maternity hospital, and a brothel are also visited and a number of other Dublin scenes and characters are also introduced. A novel which ranges from extreme realism to fantasy, Ulysses can be read as a study of Dublin in 1904, exploring various aspects of the city's life, dwelling on its squalor and monotony. This combination of kaleidoscopic writing, reliance on a formal schema to structure the narrative, and an exquisite attention to detail represents one of the book's major contributions to the development of 20th-century modernist literature.

15.4.4. *Finnegans Wake

Finnegans Wake, a prose work by Joyce was published in 1939. It was written in a unique and extremely difficult style, making use of puns and portmanteau words (using at least 40 languages besides English), and a very wide range of allusion. The central theme of the work is a cyclical pattern of history, of fall and resurrection inspired by Vico's Scienza nuova. Giambattista Vico's cyclical view of history (in which civilization rises from chaos, passes through theocratic, aristocratic, and democratic phases, and then lapses back into chaos) structures the text's narrative, as evidenced by the opening and closing words of the book: Finnegans Wake opens with the words "riverrun, past Eve and Adam's, from swerve of shore to bend of bay, brings us by a commodius vicus of recirculation back to Howth Castle and Environs" and ends "A way a lone a last a loved along the". In other words, the book ends with the beginning of a sentence and begins with the end of the same sentence, turning the narrative into one great cycle.

Along with the above-mentioned novels, Joyce has a play titled Exile which happens to portray a husband-and-wife relationship and three books of poetry to his credit. The first full-length collection was Chamber Music (1907), which consisted of 36 short lyrics. It led to his inclusion in the Imagist Anthology, edited by Ezra Pound, a champion of Joyce's work. Other poetry Joyce published in his lifetime includes "Gas from a Burner" (1912), Pomes Penyeach (1927), and "Ecce Puer" (written in 1932 to mark the birth of his grandson and the recent death of his father). These were published by the Black Sun Press in Collected Poems (1936).

15.5. James Joyce's literary styles

James Joyce's literary styles are renowned for their innovation, complexity, and profound impact on modernist literature. Throughout his works, Joyce pushed the boundaries of conventional storytelling, employing a myriad of techniques to delve into the depths of the human psyche and explore the intricacies of identity, society, and language. One of Joyce's most notable stylistic devices is the use of stream-of-consciousness narration. By presenting characters' thoughts and perceptions in a continuous flow, he allowed readers to immerse themselves in the characters' inner worlds. This technique is prominently displayed in works like Ulysses and A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, enriching the reader's understanding of the characters' motivations and emotions. Joyce's linguistic virtuosity is evident in his masterful wordplay and manipulation of language. He coined new words, fused languages, and experimented with puns, metaphors, and allusions. In Finnegans Wake, he took this experimentation to an unparalleled level, creating a dreamlike and multilayered narrative where words metamorphosed to evoke different meanings and sounds. His innovative narrative structures also set him apart. In Ulysses, each chapter is a distinct literary style, echoing various episodes from Homer's Odyssey. This unconventional approach challenges the reader, contributing to the novel's complexity and artistic brilliance. Joyce's portrayal of Dublin and Ireland is another hallmark of his literary style. With vivid descriptions and a keen eye for detail, he captured the city's essence, making Dublin a central character in many of his works. His unflinching portrayal of Irish society and the impact of colonialism sparked both admiration and controversy. James Joyce's literary styles continue to inspire and influence generations of writers. His daring experimentation, linguistic creativity, and deep exploration of human consciousness have cemented his place as a literary pioneer, leaving an enduring legacy in the annals of world literature. Thus, Joyce uses an infinite variety of subtle stylistic variations, kunstlerroman plot, stream of consciousness or interior monologue, epiphanies, paired repetitions, symbols, and unique language injecting a plethora of literary techniques in the literary field of his age.

15.5.1. Repetitions

Repetitions as a stylistic and structural device offer an endless difference in sameness. Joyce uses Stephen's (A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man) remembrances or recollections as synectic triggers for elliptical telling of the first event, just expressed differently. These remembrances are selective in details and often differ in the form in which they are remembered. There is a presence of paired repetitions in three parallel paragraphs where Stephen remembers Eileen's long white hands, which focuses on highlighting some specific theme: "Eileen had long white hands. One evening while playing tig she had put her hands over his eyes: long and white and thin and cold and soft. That was ivory: a cold white thing. That was the meaning of Tower of Ivory."

15.5.2. Stream of consciousness and epiphany

Stream of consciousness is a narrative technique that attempts to simulate how thoughts are experienced by the conscious mind- perceived in a continuous non-linear flow where one mental event leads to another through association. The quintessential modernist novel, Ulysses, is celebrated not just for its usage of stream of consciousness and interior monologue, but also for the richness of the literary puns and allusions employed, inscribing it as a highly referential work. For example, in the initial lines of Leopold's wife Molly's 45-page long, unpunctuated monologue: "Yes because he never did a thing like that before as ask to get his breakfast in bed with a couple of eggs since the City Arms hotel when he used to be pretending to be laid up with a sick voice doing his highness to make himself interesting for that old [...] Mrs Riordan that he thought he had a great leg of and she never left us a farthing..."

In this example, Joyce chooses to make use of no punctuation at all — however, it is common to see this bending of grammar across a spectrum, such as by using ellipses, dashes and oddly-placed line breaks. The progression also happens associatively, where thoughts are prompted through links that often appear random and unclear, either with other thoughts or due to sensory impressions. Minimal or no authorial intervention being the foremost characteristics of stream of consciousness technique Joyce aimed at letting the character's thoughts appear naturally, unmediated by him.

A series of epiphanies is Joyce's main device for the furthering of his artistic purpose, of advancing his narrative. Joyce described the sudden 'revelation of the whatness of a thing', the moment in which 'the soul of the commonest object seems to us radiant' as a moment of epiphany. A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man depicts the attempt of a gifted youngster growing into manhood to understand the world and place it in a perspective with which he can cope. His epiphanies provide him with rationalizations and frameworks within which he may relieve his sense of inferiority and deal with the pressures of his existence and the demands made on him by his church, family, country and friends.

15.5.3. Symbolism

Joyce has managed a distinctive reinvention of symbolist experience through the 'epiphanic' moments in his works and its aesthetic theory and he has revived and immeasurably extended the presentation of the 'stream of consciousness', which previously existed. He has used a large number of symbols which lend richness and scope of imaginative interpretations in A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man. As the narrative moves; there are the mention of birds and thus the images of flight which suggests the freedom Stephen must have. When Joyce describes his encounter with the wading girl, all the imageries deal with birds and flight. Even the girl seems to have been changed by music into "the likeness of a strange and beautiful seabird." When Stephen's friends called out his name, he has vaguely realized the prophetic quality of their banter and an 'ecstasy of flight' had made his eyes radiant. "His soul was in flight. His soul was soaring in an air beyond the word....this was the call of life to his soul....an instant of wild flight had delivered him...." And the book closes with a final reference to Daedalus: "Old father, old artificer, stand me now and ever in good stead." Thus, through the use of symbolic imagery and the symbolic name, Joyce compares the flight of the ancient Daedalus and Icarus with the contemporary flight of Stephen from the suffocating environment of his life in Ireland.
